NOTE BY THE LATE MR. ALLAN QUATERMAIN

My friend, into whose hands I hope all these manuscripts of mine will pass one day, of this one I have something to

A long while ago I jotted down in it the history of the events that it details with more or less completeness. This I did for my own satisfaction. You will have noted how memory fails us as we advance in years; we recollect, with an almost painful exactitude, what we experienced and saw in our youth, but the happenings of our middle life slip away from us or become blurred, like a stretch of low-lying landscape overflowed by grey and nebulous mist. Far off the sun still seems to shine upon the plains and hills of adolescence and early manhood. as yet it shines about us in the fleeting hours of our age, that ground on which we stand to-day, but the valley between is filled with fog. Yes, even its prominences, which symbolise the more startling events of that past, often are lost in this confusing fog.

It was an appreciation of these truths which led me to set down the following details (though of course much is omitted) of my brief intercourse with the strange and splendid creature whom I knew under the names of Ayesha, or Hiya, or Shewho-commands; not indeed with any view to their publication but before I forgot them that, if I wished to do so, I might re-peruse them in the evening of old age to which I hope to attain.

Indeed, at the time the last thing I intended was that they should be given to the world even after my own death, because they, or many of them, are so unusual that I feared lest they should cause smiles and in a way cast a slur upon my memory and truthfulness. Also, as you will read, as to this matter made a promise and I have always tried to keep my promise and to guard the secrets of others. For these reasons proposed, in case I neglected or forgot to destroy them myself to leave a direction that this should be done by my executors Further, I have been careful to make no allusion whateve to them either in casual conversation or in anything else tha I may have written, my desire being that this page of my lif should be kept quite private, something known only to myself. Therefore, too. I never so much as hinted of them to anyone. not even to vourself to whom I have told so much.

Well. I recorded the main facts concerning this expedition and its issues, simply and with as much exactness as I could, and laid them aside. I do not say that I never thought of them again, since amongst them were some which, together, with the problems they suggested, proved to be of an unforgettable nature.

Also, whenever any of Ayesha's sayings or stories which are not preserved in these pages came back to me, as has happened from time to time, I jotted them down and put them away with this manuscript. Thus among these notes you will find a history of the city of Kôr as she told it to me, which I have omitted here Still, many of these remarkable events did more or less fade from my mind, as the image does from an unfixed photograph, till only their outlines remained, faint if distinguishable

To tell the truth, I was rather ashamed of the whole story in which I cut so poor a figure. On reflection it was obvious to me, although honesty had compelled me to set out all that is essential exactly as it occurred, adding nothing and taking nothing away, that I had been the victim of very gross deceit. This strange woman, whom I had met in the ruins of a place called Kor, without any doubt had thrown a glamour over my senses and at the moment almost caused me to believe much that is quite unbelievable

For instance, she had told me ridiculous stories as to interviews between herself and certain heathen goddesses, though it is true that, almost with her next breath, these she qualified or contradicted. Also, she had suggested that her life had been prolonged far beyond our mortal span, for hundreds and hundreds of years, indeed, which, as Euclid says, is absurd, and had pretended to supernatural powers, which is still more absurd. Moreover, by a clever use of some hypnotic or mesmeric power, she had feigned to transport me to some, place beyond the earth and in the Halls of Hades to show me what is veiled from the eyes of man, and not only me, but the savage warrior Umhlopekazi, commonly called Umslopogaas of the Axe, who, with Hans, a Hottentot, was my companion upon that adventure. There were like things equally incredible, such as her appearance, when all seemed lost, in the battle with the troll-like Rezu. To omit these, the sum of it was that I had been shamefully duped, and if anyone finds himself eves fell upon was a picture of a veiled woman, the sight of which made my heart stand still, so painfully did it remind me of a certain veiled woman whom once it had been my fortune to meet. Glancing from it to the printed page one word seemed to leap at me. It was Kôr! Now of veiled women there are plenty in the world, but were there also two Kôrs?

Then I turned to the beginning and began to read. This happened in the autumn when the sun does not rise till about six, but it was broad daylight before I ceased from reading.

Oh! what was I to make of it? For here in its pages (to say nothing of old Billali, who, by the way lied, probably to order, when he told Mr. Holly that no white man had visited his country for many generations, and those gloomy maneating Amahagger scoundrels) once again I found myself face to face with She-who-commands, now rendered as She-whomust-be-obeyed, which means much the same thing-in her case at least; yes, with Ayesha the lovely, the mystic, the changeful and the imperious.

Moreover the history filled up many gaps in my own limited experiences of that enigmatical being who was half divine (though, I think, rather wicked or at any rate unmoral in her way) and yet all woman. It is true that it showed her in lights very different from and higher than those in which she had presented herself to me. Yet the substratum of her character was the same, or rather of her characters, for of these she seemed to have several in a single body, being as she said of herself to me, 'not One but Many and not Here but Everywhere.'

Further, I found the story of Kallikrates which I had set down as a mere falsehood invented for my bewilderment, expanded and explained. Or rather not explained, since, perhaps that she might deceive, to me she had spoken of this murdered Kallikrates without enthusiasm, as a handsome person to whom, because of an indiscretion of her youth, she was bound by destiny and whose return-somewhat to her sorrow-she must await. At least she did so at first, though in the end when she bared her heart at the moment of our farewell, she vowed she loved him only and was 'appointed' to him 'by a divine decree.'

Also I found other things of which I knew nothing, such as the Fire of Life with its fatal gift of indefinite existence, although I remember that like the giant Rezu whom Umslopogaas defeated, she did talk of a 'Cup of Life' of which she had drunk, that might have been offered to my lips, had I been politic, bowed the knee and shown more faith in her and her supernatural pretensions.

Lastly I saw the story of her end, and as I read it I wept, yes, I confess I wept, although I feel sure that she will return again. Now I understood why she had quailed and even seemed to shrivel when, in my last interview with her, stung beyond endurance by her witcheries and sarcasms, I had suggested that even for her with all her powers, Fate might reserve one of its shrewdest blows. Some prescience had told her that if the words seemed random, Truth spoke through my lips, although, and this was the worst of it, she did not know what weapon would deal the stroke or when and where it was doomed to fall.

I was amazed, I was overcome, but as I closed that book I made up my mind, first that I would continue to preserve absolute silence as to Ayesha and my dealings with her, as, during my life, I was bound by oath to do, and secondly that I would not cause my manuscript to be destroyed. I did not feel that I had any right to do so in view of what already had been published to the world. There let it lie to appear one day, or not to appear, as might be fated. Meanwhile my lips were sealed. I would give Good back his book without comment and—buy another copy!

One more word. It is clear that I did not touch more than the fringe of the real Ayesha. In a thousand ways she bewitched and deceived me so that I never plumbed her nature's depths. Perhaps this was my own fault because from the first I shewed a lack of faith in her and she wished to pay me back in her own fashion, or perhaps she had other private reasons for her secrecy. Certainly the character she discovered to me differed in many ways from that which she revealed to Mr. Holly and to Leo Vincey, or Kallikrates, whom, it seems, once she slew in her jealousy and rage.

She told me as much as she thought it fit that I should

The Grange, Yorkshire.

Now the reason of all this homily is that I, Allan, the most practical and unimaginative of persons, just a homely, half-educated hunter and trader who chances to have seen a good deal of the particular little world in which his lot was cast, at one period of my life became the victim of spiritual longings.

I am a man who has suffered great bereavements in mytime such as have seared my soul, since, perhaps because of my rather primitive and simple nature, my affections are very strong. By day or night I can never forget those whom I have loved and whom I believe to have loved me.

For you know, in our vanity some of us are apt to hold that certain people with whom we have been intimate upon the earth, really did care for us and, in our still greater vanity—or should it be called madness?—to imagine that they still care for us after they have left the earth and entered on some new state of society and surroundings which, if they exist, inferentially are much more congenial than any they can have experienced here. At times, however, cold doubts strike us as to this matter of which we long to know the truth. Also behind looms a still blacker doubt, namely whether they live at all.

For some years of my lonely existence these problems haunted me day by day, till at length I desired above everything on earth to lay them at rest in one way or another. Once, at Durban, I met a man who was a spiritualist to whom I confided a little of my perplexities. He laughed at me and said that they could be settled with the greatest ease. All I had to do was to visit a certain local medium who for a fee of one guinea would tell me everything I wanted to know. Although I rather grudged the guinea, being more than usually hard up at the time, I called upon this person, but over the results of that visit, or rather the lack of them, I draw a veil.

My queer and penaps unwholesome longing, however, remained with me and would not be abated. I consulted a clergyman of my acquaintance, a good and spiritually-minded man, but he could only shrug his shoulders and refer me to the Bible, saying, quite rightly I doubt not, that with what it reveals I ought to be contented. Then I read certain mystical books which were recommended to me. These were full of fine words, undiscoverable in a pocket dictionary, but really took me no forwarder, since in them I found nothing that I could not have invented myself, although while I was actually studying them, they seemed to convince me. I even tackled Swedenborg, or rather samples of him, for he is very copious, but without satisfactory results.

Then I gave up the business.

Some months later I was in Zululand and being near the Black Kloof where he dwelt, I paid a visit to my acquaintance of whom I have written elsewhere, the wonderful and ancient dwarf, Zikali, known as 'The-Thing-that-should-never-havebeen-born,' also more universally among the Zulus 'Opener-of-Roads.' When we had talked of many things connected with the state of Zululand and its politics, I rose to. leave for my waggon, since I never cared for sleeping in the Black Kloof if it could be avoided.

'Is there nothing else that you want to ask me, Macumazahn?' asked the old dwarf, tossing back his long hair and looking at-I had almost written through-me.

I shook my head.

That is strange, Macumazahn, for I seem to see something written on your mind-something to do with spirits.'

Then I remembered all the problems that had been troubling me, although in truth I had never thought of propounding them to Zikali,

'Ah! it comes back, does it?' he exclaimed, reading my thought. 'Out with it, then, Macumazahn, while I am in a mood to answer, and before I grow tired, for you are an old friend of mine and will so remain till the end, many years hence, and if I can serve you, I will."

I filled my pipe and sat down again upon the stool of carved red-wood which had been brought for me.

'You are named 'Opener-of-Roads,' are you not, Zikali?' I said.

'Yes, the Zulus have always called me that, since before the days of Chaka. But what of names, which often enough

'Only that I want to open a road, Zikali, that which runs across the River of Death.

'Oho!' he laughed, 'it is very easy,' and snatching up a little assegai that lay beside him, he proffered it to me, adding, 'Be brave now and fall on that. Then before I have counted sixty the road will be wide open, but whether you will see

Again I shook my head and answered,

'It is against our law. Also while I still live I desire to know whether I shall meet certain others on that road of my time has come to cross the River. Perhaps you who deal with spirits can prove the matter to me, which no one else seems able to do.

'Oho!' laughed Zikali again, 'What do my ears hear? Am I, the poor Zulu cheat, as you will remember once you called me, Macumazahn, asked to show that which is hidden from all the wisdom of the great White People?"

'The question is,' I answered with irritation, 'not what you are asked to do, but what you can do.'

'That I do not know yet, Macumazahn. Whose spirits do you desire to see? If that of a woman called Mamcena is one of them. I think that perhaps I whom she loved—"

'She is not one of them, Zikali. Moreover, if she loved you, you paid back her love with death.'

'Which perhaps was the kindest thing I could do, Macunazahn, for reasons that you may be able to guess, and others with which I will not trouble you. But if not hers, whose? Let me look, let me look! Why there seem to be two of them, head-wives, I mean, and I thought that white men only took one wife. Also a multitude of others; their faces float up in the water of your mind. An old man with grey hair, little children, perhaps they were brothers and sisters, and some who may be friends. Also very clear indeed that Mamcena whom you do not wish to see. Well, Macumazahn, this is unfortunate, since she is the only one whom I can show you, or rather put you in the way of finding. Unless indeed there are other Kaffir women—

'What do you mean?' I asked.

'I mean, Macumazahn, that only black feet travel on the road which I can open; over those in which ran white blood I have no power.'

'Then it is finished,' I said, rising again and taking a step or two towards the gate.

'Come back and sit down, Macumazahn. I did not say so. Am I the only ruler of magic in Africa, which I am told is a big country?'

I came back and sat down, for my curiosity, a great failing with me, was excited.

'Thank you, Zikali.' I said, 'but I will have no dealings with more of your witch-doctors.'

'No, no, because you are afraid of them; quite without reason, Macumazahn, seeing that they are all cheats except the world lasts, because she has found the secret of life unending.

'You mean that she is an immortal, Zikali,' I answered with a smile.

'I do not say that, Macumazahn, because my little mind cannot shape the thought of immortality. But when I was a babe, which is far ago, she had lived so long that scarce would she know the difference between then and now, and already in her breast was all wisdom gathered. I know it, because although, as I have said, we have never seen each other, at times we talk together in our sleep, for thus she shares her loneliness, and I think, though this may be but a dream, that last night she told me to send you on to her to seek an answer to certain questions which you would put to me to-day. Also to me she seemed to desire that you should do her a service: I know not what service.'

Now I grew angry and asked.

Why does it please you to fool me, Zikali, with such talk as this? If there is any truth in it, show me where the woman called Oucen lives and how I am to come to her.'

The old wizard took up the little assegai which he had offered to me and with its blade raked out ashes from the fire that always burnt in front of him. While he did so, he talked to me, as I thought in a random fashion, perhaps to distract my attention, of a certain white man whom he said I should meet upon my journey and of his affairs, also of other matters. none of which interested me much at the time. These ashes he natted down flat and then on them drew a map with the point of his spear, making grooves for streams, certain marks for bush and forest, wavy lines for water and swamps and little heaps for hills.

When he had finished it all he bade me come round the fire and study the picture, across which by an after-thought he drew a wandering furrow with the edge of the assegai to represent a river, and gathered the ashes in a lump at the northern end to signify a large mountain.

'Look at it well. Macumazahn,' he said, 'and forget nothing, since if you make this journey and forget, you die. Nay, no need to copy it in that book of yours, for see, I will stamp it on your mind,'

Then suddenly he gathered up the warm ashes in a double handful and threw them into my face, muttering something as he did so and adding aloud,

'Yes. I know,' I answered, bethinking me of another statuette of his which he had given to me on the morrow of the death of her from whom it was modelled. But what of the thing?

'Macumazahn, it has come down to me through the ages. As you may have heard, all great doctors when they die pass on their wisdom and something of their knowledge to another doctor of spirits who is still living on the earth, that nothing may be lost, or as little as possible. Also I have learned that to such likenesses as these may be given the strength of him or her from whom they were shaped."

Now I bethought me of the old Egyptians and their Ka statues of which I had read, and that these statues, magicalig charmed and set in the tombs of the departed, were supposed to be inhabited everlastingly by the Doubles of the dead endued with more power even than ever these possessed in life. But of this I said nothing to Zikali, thinking that it would take too much explanation, though I wondered very much how he had come by the same idea.

'When that ivory is hung over your heart. Macumazahn, where you must always wear it, learn that with it goes the strength of Zikali; the thought that would have been his thought and the wisdom that is his wisdom, will be your companions, as much as though he walked at your side and could instruct you in every peril. Moreover north and south and east and west this image is known to men who, when they see it, will bow down and obey, opening a road to him who wears the medicine of the Opener-of-Roads.

'Indeed.' I said, smiling, 'and what is this colour on the ivory?

'I forget. Macumazahn, who have had it a great number of years, ever since it descended to me from a forefather of mine who was fashioned in the same mould as I am. It looks like blood, does it not? It is a pity that Mameena is not still alive, since she whose memory was so excellent might have been able to tell you, and as he spoke, with a motion that was at once sure and swift, he threw the loop of elephant hair over my head.

Hastily I changed the subject, feeling that after his wont this old wizard, the most terrible man whom ever I knew, who had been so much concerned with the tragic death of Mameena, was stabbing at me in some hidden fashion.

You tell me to go on this journey.' I said, 'and not alone. Yet for companion you give me only an ugly piece of What plots, Zikali; and how can my taking a distant journey tell you anything about them?'

'You know them well enough, Macumazahn; they have to do with the overthrow of a Royal House that has worked me bitter wrong. As to how your journey can help me, why, thus. You shall promise me to ask of this Queen whether Zikali, Opener-of-Roads, shall triumph or be overthrown in that on which he has set his heart."

'As you seem to know this witch so well, why do you not ask her yourself, Zikali?'

To ask is one thing, Macumazahn. To get an answer is another. I have asked in the watches of the night, and the, reply was "Come hither and perchance I will tell you." "Queen," I said, "how can I come save in the spirit, who am an ancient and crippled dwarf scarcely able to stand upon my feet?"

"Then send a messenger, Wizard, and be sure that he is white, for of black savages I have seen more than enough. Let him bear a token also that he comes from you and tell me of it in your sleep. Moreover let that token be something of power which will protect him on the journey."

'Such is the answer that comes to me in my dreams, Macumazahn.'

'Well, what token will you give me, Zikali?'

He groped about in his robe and produced a piece of ivory of the size of a large chessman, that had a hole in it, through which ran a plaited cord of the stiff hairs from an elephant's tail. On this article, which was of a rusty brown colour, he breathed, then having whispered to it for a while, handed it to me.

I took the talisman, for such I guessed it to be, idly enough, held it to the light to examine it, and started back so violently that almost I let it fall. I do not quite know why I started, but I think it was because some influence seemed to lean from it to me. Zikali started also and cried out,

'Have a care, Macumazahn Am I young that I can bear being dashed to the ground?'

'What do you mean?' I asked, still staring at the thing which I perceived to be a most wonderfully fashioned likeness of the old dwarf himself as he appeared before me crouched upon the ground. There were the deepset eyes, the great head, the toad-like shape, the long hair, all,

'It is a clever carving, is it not, Macumazahn? I am skilled in that art, you know, and therefore can judge of carving."

ivory shaped as no man ever was,' here I got one back at Zikali, 'and from the look of it, steeped in blood, which ivory if I had my way, I would throw into the camp fire. Who, then, am I to take with me?'

Don't do that, Macumazahn—I mean throw the ivory into the fire—since I have no wish to burn before my time, and if you do, you who have worn it might burn with me. At least certainly you would die with the magic thing and go to acquire knowledge more quickly than you desire. No, no, and do not try to take it off your neck, or rather try if you will.'

I did try, but something seemed to prevent me from accomplishing my purpose of giving the carving back to Zikali as I wished to do. First my pipe got in the way of my hand, then the elephant hairs caught in the collar of my coat; then a pang of rheumatism to which I was accustomed from an old lion-bite, developed of a sudden in my arm, and lastly I grew tired of bothering about the thing.

Zikali, who had been watching my movements, burst out into one of his terrible laughs that seemed to fill the whole kloof and to re-echo from its rocky walls. It died away and he went on, without further reference to the talisman or image.

'You asked whom you were to take with you, Macumazahn. Well, as to this I must make inquiry of those who know. Man, my medicines!'

From the shadows in the hut behind darted out a tall figure carrying a great spear in one hand and in the other a catskin bag which with a salute he laid down at the feet of his master. This salute, by the way, was that of a Zulu word which means 'Lord' or 'Home' of Ghosts.

Zikali groped in the bag and produced from it certain knucklebones.

'A common method,' he muttered, 'such as every vulgar wizard uses, but one that is quick and, as the matter concerned is small, will serve my turn. Let us see now, whom you shall take with you, Macumazahn.'

Then he breathed upon the bones, shook them up in his thin hands and with a quick turn of the wrist, threw them into the air. After this he studied them carefully, where they lay among the ashes which he had raked out of the fire, those that he had used for the making of his map.

'Do you know a man named Umslopogaas, Macumazahn, the chief of a tribe that is called The People of the Axe, whose titles of praise are Bulalio or the Slaughterer, and Wood-

'No. I think you three will be enough, with a guard of soldiers from the People of the Axe, for you will meet with fighting, and a ghost or two. Umslopogaas has always one at ais elbow named Nada, and perhaps you have several. For instance, there was a certain Mameena whom I always seem to feel about me when you are near, Macumazahn,

Why, the wind is rising again, which is odd on so still an evening. Listen how it wails, yes, stirs your hair, though mine hangs straight enough. But why do I talk of ghosts, seeing that you travel to seek other ghosts, white ghosts, beyond my ken, who can only deal with those that were

'Good-night, Macumazahn, good-night. When you return from visiting the white Queen, that Great One beneath whose feet I, Zikali, who am also great in my way, am but a grain of dust, come and tell me her answer to my question.

'Meanwhile, be careful always to wear that pretty little image which I have given you, as a young lover sometimes wears a lock of hair cut from the head of some fool-girl that he thinks is fond of him. It will bring you safety and luck, Macumazahn, which, for the most part, is more than the lock of hair does to the lover. Oh! it is a strange world, full of jest to those who can see the strings that work it. I am one of them, and perhaps, Macumazahn, you are another, or will be before all is done-or begun.

'Good-night and good fortune to you on your journeyings, and, Macumazahn, although you are so fond of women, be careful not to fall in love with that white Queen, because it would make others jealous; I mean some whom you have lost sight of for a while, also I think that being under a curse of her own, she is not one whom you can put into your sack. Oho! Oho-ho! Slave, bring me my blanket, it grows cold, and my medicine also, that which protects me from the ghosts, who are thick to-night. Macumazahn brings them, I think.

I turned to depart but when I had gone a little way Zikali alled me back again and said, speaking very low,

'When you meet this Umslopogaas, as you will meet him, ie who is called the Woodpecker and the Slaughterer, say

"A bat has been twittering round the hut of the Openerf-Roads, and to his ears it squeaked the name of a certain ousta and the name of a woman called Monazi. Also it vittered another greater name that may not be uttered, that phant sniffs the air with his trunk and grows angry, and sharpens his tusks to dig a certain Woodpecker out of his hole in a tree that grows near the Witch Mountain. Say too, that the Opener-of-Roads thinks that this Woodpecker would be wise to fly north for a while in the company of one who watches by night, lest harm should come to a bird that pecks at the feet of the great and chatters of it in his nest."

Then Zikali waved his hand and I went, wondering into what plot I had stumbled.

THE MESSENGERS

I DID not rest as I should that night who somehow w never able to sleep well in the neighbourhood of the Bla Kloof. I suppose that Zikali's constant talk about ghos with his hints and innuendoes concerning those who we dead, always affected my nerves till, in a subconscious wa I began to believe that such things existed and were hanging about me. Many people are open to the power of suggestio and I am afraid that I am one of them.

However, the sun which has such strength to kill noxion things, put an end to ghosts more quickly even that it do to other evil vapours and emanations, and when I woke u to find it shining brilliantly in a pure heaven, I laughed wit much heartiness over the whole affair.

Going to the spring near which we were outspanned, I too off my shirt to have a good wash, still chuckling at th memory of all the hocus-pocus of my old friend, the Opener

While engaged in this matutinal operation I struck m hand against something and looking, observed that it was th hideous little ivory image of Zikali which he had set about m neck. The sight of the thing and the memory of his ridiculou talk about it, especially of his assertion that it had come down to him through the ages, which it could not have done, seeing that it was a likeness of himself, irritated me so much that proceeded to take it off with the full intention of throwing

As I was in the act of doing this, from a clump of reed mixed with bushes, quite close to me, there came a sound of hissing, and suddenly above them appeared the head of a great black immamba, perhaps the deadliest of all our African snakes, and the only one I know which will attack man

Leaving go of the image, I sprang back in a great hurry towards where my gun lay. Then the snake vanished and making sure that it had departed to its hole, which was 26 probably at a distance, I returned to the pool, and once more began to take off the talisman in order to consign it to the bottom of the pool.

After all, I reflected, it was a hideous and probably a bloodstained thing which I did not in the least wish to wear about my neck like a lady's love-token.

Just as it was coming over my head, suddenly from the other side of the bush that infernal snake popped up again, this time, it was clear, really intent on business. It began to move towards me in the lightning-like way immambas have, hissing and flicking its tongue.

I was too quick for my friend, however, for snatching up the gun that I had laid down beside me, I let it have a charge of buckshot in the neck which nearly cut it in two, so that it fell down and expired with hideous convulsive writhings.

Hearing the shot Hans came running from the waggon to see what was the matter. Hans, I should say, was that same Hottentot who had been the companion of most of my journeyings since my father's day. He was with me when as a young fellow I accompanied Retief to Dingaan's kraal, and like myself, escaped the massacre. Also we shared many other adventures, including the great one in the Land of the Ivory Child where he slew the huge elephant-god, Jana, and himself was slain. But of this journey we did not dream in those days.

For the rest Hans was a most entirely unprincipled person, but as the Boers say, 'clever as a waggonload of monkeys.' Also he drank when he got the chance. One good quality he had, however; no man was ever more faithful, and perhaps it would be true to say that neither man nor woman ever loved me, unworthy, quite so well.

In appearance he rather resembled an antique and dilapidated baboon; his face was wrinkled like a dried nut and his quick little eyes were bloodshot. I never knew what his age was, any more than he did himself, but the years had left him tough as whipcord and absolutely untiring. Lastly he was perhaps the best hand at following a spoor that ever I knew and up to a hundred and fifty yards or so, a very deadly shot with a rifle especially when he used a little single-barrelled, muzzle-loading gun of mine made by Purdey which he named Intombi or Maiden. Of that gun, however, I have written in 'The Holy Flower' and elsewhere.

'What is, it, Baas?' he asked. 'Here there are no lions, nor any game.'

'Look the other side of the bush, Hans.'

He slipped round it, making a wide circle with his usual caution, then, seeing the snake which was, by the way, I think, the biggest immamba I ever killed, suddenly froze, as it were, in a stiff attitude that reminded me of a pointer when it scents game. Having made sure that it was dead, he nodded and said,

Black 'mamba, or so you would call it, though I know

'What else, Hans?'

'One of the old witch-doctor Zikali's spirits which he sets at the mouth of this kloof to warn him of who comes or goes. I know it well, and so do others. I saw it listening behind a stone when you were up the kloof last evening talking with the Opener-of-Roads.'

'Then Zikali will lack a spirit.' I answered, laughing, which perhaps he will not miss amongst so many. It serves him right for setting the brute on me.'

'Quite so, Baas. He will be angry. I wonder why he did it?' he added suspiciously, 'seeing that he is such a friend of yours.'

'He didn't do it, Hans. These snakes are very fierce and give battle, that is all."

. Hans paid no attention to my remark, which probably he thought only worthy of a white man who does not understand, but rolled his yellow, bloodshot eyes about, as though in search of explanations. Presently they fell upon the ivory that hung about my neck, and he started.

'Why do you wear that pretty likeness of the Great One yonder over your heart, as I have known you do with things that belonged to women in past days, Baas? Do you know that it is Zikali's Great Medicine, nothing less, as everyone does throughout the land? When Zikali sends an order far away, he always sends that image with it, for then he who receives the order knows that he must obey or die. Also the messenger knows that he will come to no harm if he does not take it off, because, Baas, the image is Zikali himself, and Zikali is the image. They are one and the same. Also it is the image of his father's father—or so he says.'

'That is an odd story,' I said.

Then I told Hans as much as I thought advisable of how this horrid little talisman came into my possession.

Hans nodded without showing any surprise.

'So we are going on a long journey,' he said. 'Well I thought it was time that we did something more than wander about these tame countries selling blankets to stinking old women and so forth, Baas. Moreover, Zikali does not wish that you should come to harm, doubtless because he does wish to make use of you afterwards—oh! it is safe to talk now when that spirit is away looking for another snake. What were you doing with the Great Medicine, Baas, when the 'mamba attacked you?'

Taking it off to throw it into the pool, Hans, as I do not like the thing. I tried twice and each time the immaniba appeared.'

'Of course it appeared, Baas, and what is more, if you had taken that Medicine off and thrown it away you would have disappeared, since the 'mamba would have killed you. Zikali wanted to show you that, Baas, and that is why he set the snake at you.'

'You are a superstitious old fool, Hans.'

'Yes, Baas, but my father knew all about that Great Medicine before me, for he was a bit of a doctor, and so does every wizard and witch for a thousand miles or more. I tell you, Baas, it is known by all though no one ever talks about it, no, not even the king himself. Baas, speaking to you, not with the voice of Hans the old drunkard, but with that of the Predikant, your reverend father, who made so good a Christian of me and who tells me to do so from up in Heaven where the hot fires are which the wood feeds of itself, I beg you not to try to throw away that Medicine again, or if you wish to do so, to leave me behind on this journey. For you see, Baas, although I am now so good, almost like one of those angels with the pretty goose's wings in the pictures, I feel that I should like to grow a little better before I go to the Place of Fires to make report to your reverend father, the Predikant.

Thinking of how horrified my dear father would be if he could hear all this string of ridiculous nonsense and learn the result of his moral and religious lessons on raw Hottentot material, I burst out laughing. But Hans went on as gravely as a judge,

Wear the Great Medicine. Baas, wear it; part with the liver inside you before you part with that, Baas. It may not be as pretty or smell as sweet as a woman's hair in a little gold bottle, but it is much more useful. The sight of the woman's hair will only make you sick in your stomach and cause you remember a lot of things which you had much better forg ut the Great Medicine, or rather Zikali who is in it, will ke ne assegais and sickness out of you and turn back bad mag in to the heads of those who sent it, and always bring lenty to eat and perhaps, if we are lucky, a little to dri

'Go away,' I said, 'I want to wash.'

'Yes, Baas, but with the Baas's leave I will sit on the oth side of that bush with the gun-not to look at the Ba without his clothes, because white people are always so up that it makes me feel ill to see them undressed, also becar the Baas will forgive me-but because they smell. No, r for that, but just to see that no other snake comes.'

'Get out of the road, you dirty little scoundrel, and st your impudence,' I said, lifting my foot suggestively.

Thereon he scooted with a subdued grin round the of side of the bush, whence as I knew well he kept his eye fix on me to be sure that I made no further attempt to take the Great Medicine.

Now of this talisman I may as well say at once that I no believer in it or its precious influences. Therefore, althou it was useful sometimes, notably twice when Umslopogaas v concerned. I do not know whether personally I should he done better or worse upon that journey if I had thrown

It is true, however, that until quite the end of this hist when it became needful to do so to save another, I never may any further attempt to remove it from my neck, not even w it rubbed a sore in my skin, because I did not wish to offe the prejudices of Hans.

It is true, moreover, that this hideous every had a repu tion which stretched very far from the place where it made and was regarded with great reverence by all kinds queer people, even by the Amahagger themselves, of wh presently, as they say in pedigrees, a fact of which I fo sundry proofs. Indeed, I saw a first example of it whe little while later I met that great warrior, Umslopogaas, C of the People of the Axe.

For, after determining firmly, for reasons which I will out, that I would not visit this man, in the end I did although by then I had given up any idea of journeying ac the Zambesi to look for a mysterious and non-existent wi woman, as Zikali had suggested that I should do. To be with I knew that his talk was all rubbish and, even if it were not, that at the bottom of it was some desire of the Opener-of-Roads that I should make a path for him to travel towards an indefinite but doubtless evil object of his own. Further, by this time I had worn through that mood of mine which had caused me to yearn for correspondence with the departed and a certain knowledge of their existence. I wonder whether many people understand, as I do, how entirely distinct and how variable are these moods which sway us, or at any rate some of us, at sundry periods of our lives. As I think I have already suggested, at one time we are all spiritual; at another all physical; at one time we are sure that our lives here are as a dream and a shadow and that the real existence lies elsewhere; at another that these brief days of ours are the only business with which we have to do and that of it we must make the best. At one time we think our loves much more immortal than the stars; at another that they are mere shadows cast by the baleful sin of desire upon the shallow and fleeting water we call Life which seems to flow out of nowhere into nowhere. At one time we are full of faith, at another all such hopes are blotted out by a black wall of Nothingness, and so on ad infinitum. Only very stupid people. or humbugs, are or pretend to be, always consistent and unchanging.

To return, I determined not only that I would not travel north to seek that which no living man will ever find, certainty as to the future, but also, to show my independence of Zikali, that I would not visit this chief, Umslopogaas. So, having traded all my goods and made a fair profit (on paper), I set myself to return to Natal, proposing to rest awhile in my little house at Durban, and told Hans my mind.

'Very good, Baas,' he said. 'I, too, should like to go to Durban. There are lots of things there that we cannot get here,' and he fixed his roving eye upon a square-face gin bottle, which as it happened was filled with nothing stronger than water, because all the gin was drunk. 'Yet, Baas, we shall not see the Berea for a long while?'

'Why do you say that?' I asked sharply.

'Oh! Baas, I don't know, but you went to visit the Openerof-Roads, did you not, and he told you to go north and lent you a certain Great Medicine, did he not?'

Here Hans proceeded to light his corncob pipe with an ash from the fire, all the time keeping his beady eyes fixed upon that part of me where the

'Quite true, Hans, but now I mean to show Zikali that I am not his messenger, for south or north or east or west. So to-morrow morning we cross the river and trek for Natal."

'Yes, Baas, but then why not cross it this evening? There is still light.'

'I have said that we will cross it to-morrow morning,' I answered with that firmness which I have read always indicates a man of character, 'and I do not change my word.'

'No, Baas, but sometimes other things change besides words. Will the Baas have that buck's leg for supper, or the stuff out of a tin with a dint in it, which we bought at a store two years ago? The flies have got at the buck's leg, but I cut out the bits with the maggots on it and ate them myself."

Hans was right, things do change, especially the weather. That night, unexpectedly, for when I turned in the sky seemed quite screne, there came a terrible rain long before it was due, which lasted off and on for three whole days and continued intermittently for an indefinite period. Needless to say the river, which it would have been so easy to cross on this particular evening, by the morning was a raging torrent, and so remained for several weeks.

In despair at length I trekked south to where a ford was reported, which, when reached, proved impracticable.

I tried another, a dozen miles further on, which was very hard to come to over boggy land. It looked all right and we were getting across finely, when suddenly one of the wheels sank in an unsuspected hole and there we stuck. Indeed, I believe the waggon, or bits of it, would have remained in the neighbourhood of that ford to this day, had I not managed to borrow some extra oxen belonging to a Christian Kaffir, and with their help to drag it back to the bank whence we had

As it happened I was only just in time, since a new storm which had burst further up the river, brought it down in flood again, a very heavy flood.

In this country, England, where I write, there are bridges everywhere and no one seems to appreciate them. If they think of them at all it is to grumble about the cost of their upkeep. I wish they could have experience of what a lack of them means in a wild country during times of excessive rain, and the same remark applied to roads. You should think more of your blessings, my friends, as the old woman said to to return—after this I confessed myself beaten and gave up until such time as it should please Providence to turn off the water-tap. Trekking out of sight of that infernal river which annoyed me with its constant gurgling, I camped on a comparatively dry spot that overlooked a beautiful stretch of rolling veld. Towards sunset the clouds lifted and I saw a mile or two away a most extraordinary mountain on the lower slopes of which grew a dense forest. Its upper part, which was of bare rock, looked exactly like the seated figure of a grotesque person with the chin resting on the breast. There was the head, there were the arms, there were the knees. Indeed, the whole mass of it reminded me strongly of the effigy of Zikali which was tied about my neck or rather of Zikali himself.

'What is that called?' I said to Hans, pointing to this strange hill, now blazing in the angry fire of the setting sun that had burst out between the storm clouds, which made it appear more ominous even than before.

That is the Witch Mountain, Baas, where the Chief Umslopogaas and a blood brother of his who carried a great club used to hunt with the wolves. It is haunted and in a cave at the top of it lie the bones of Nada the Lily, the fair woman whose name is a song, she who was the love of Umslopogaas."

'Rubbish,' I said, though I had heard something of all that story and remembered that Zikali had mentioned this Nada, comparing her beauty to that of another whom once

'Where then lives the Chief Umslopogaas?'

They say that his town is yonder on the plain, Baas. It is called the Place of the Axe and is strongly fortified with a river round most of it, and his people are the People of the Axe. They are a fierce people and all the country round here is so uninhabited because Umslopogaas has cleaned out the... tribes who used to live in it, first with his wolves and afterwards in war. He is so strong a chief and so terrible in battle that even Chaka himself was afraid of him, and they say that he brought Dingaan the King to his end because of a quarrel about this Nada. Cetywayo, the present king, too leaves him alone and to him he pays no tribute.'

^{&#}x27;For the story of Umslopogaas and Nada see the book called 'Nada the Lily.'—EDITOR.

Whilst I was about to ask Hans from whom he had collected all this information, suddenly I heard sounds, and looking up, saw three tall men clad in full herald's dress rushing towards us at great speed.

'Here come some chips from the Axe,' said Hans, and promptly bolted into the waggon.

I did not bolt because there was no time to do so without loss of dignity, but, although I wished I had my rifle with me. just sat still upon my stool and with great deliberation lighted my pipe, taking not the slightest notice of the three savagelooking fellows.

These, who I noted carried axes instead of assegais, rushed straight at me with the axes raised in such a fashion that anyone unacquainted with the habits of Zulu warriors of the old school, might have thought that they intended nothing short of murder.

As I expected, however, within about six feet of me they halted suddenly and stood there still as statues. For my part I went on lighting my pipe as though I did not see them and when at length I was obliged to lift my head, surveyed them with an air of mild interest.

Then I took a little book out of my pocket, it was my favourite copy of the Ingoldsby Legends-and began to read. The passage which caught my eye, if 'axe' be substituted for 'knife,' was not inappropriate. It was from 'The Nurse's

Story,' and runs,

'But, oh! what a thing 'tis to see and to know That the bare knife is raised in the hand of the foe, Without hope to repel or to ward off the blow!

This proceeding of mine astonished them a good deal who felt that they had, so to speak, missed fire. At last the soldier in the middle said.

'Are you blind, White Man?'

'No. Black Fellow,' I answered, 'but I am shortsighted, Would you be so good as to stand out of my light?' a remark which puzzled them so much that all three drew back a few paces.

When I had read a little further I came to the following lines.

'Tis plain. As anatomists tell us, that never again Shall life revisit the foully slain When once they've been cut through the jugular vein.'

In my circumstances at that moment this statement seemed altogether too suggestive, so I shut up the book and remarked.

"If you are wanderers who want food, as I judge by your being so thin. I am sorry that I have little meat, but my servants will give you what they can."

'Ow!' said the spokesman, 'he calls us wanderers! Either he must be a very great man or he is mad.'

'You are right. I am a great man,' I answered, yawning, 'and if you trouble me too much you will see that I can be mad also. Now what do you want?'

'We are messengers from the great Chief Umslopogaas, Captain of the People of the Axe, and we want tribute,' answered the man in a somewhat changed tone.

'Do you? Then you won't get it. I thought that only the King of Zululand had a right to tribute, and your Captain's name is not Cetywayo, is it?'

'Our Captain is King here,' said the man still more uncertainly.

'Is he indeed? Then away with you back to him and tell this King of whom I never heard, though I have a message for a certain Umslopogaas, that Macumazahn, Watcher-by-Night, intends to visit him to-morrow, if he will send a guide at the first light to show the best path for the waggon.'

'Hearken,' said the man to his companions, 'this is Macumazahn himself and no other. Well, we thought it, for who else would have dared-'

Then they saluted with their axes, calling me 'Chief' and other fine names, and departed as they had come, at a run, calling out that my message should be delivered and that doubtless Umslopogaas would send the guide.

So it came about that, quite contrary to my intention, after all circumstances brought me to the Town of the Axe. Even to the last moment I had not meant to go there, but when the tribute was demanded I saw that it was best to do so, and having once passed my word it could not be altered. Indeed, I felt sure that in this event there would be trouble and that my oxen would be stolen, or worse.

So Fate having issued its decree, of which Hans's version was that Zikali, or his Great Medicine, had so arranged things, I shrugged my shoulders and waited

r morning at the dawn guides arrived from the Town of Axe, bringing with them a yoke of spare oxen, which red that its Chief was really anxious to see me. So in due se we inspanned and started, the guides leading us by a sh but practicable road down the steep hillside to the er-like plain beneath, where I saw many cattle grazing relling some miles across this plain, we came at last to a r of no great breadth, that encircled a considerable Kaffir n on three sides, the fourth being protected by a little of koppies which were joined together with walls. Also place was strongly fortified with fences and in every other known to the native mind.

vith the help of the spare oxen we crossed the river safely he ford, although it was very full, and on the further side e received by a guard of men, tall, soldierlike fellows, all them armed with axes as the messengers had been. They us up to the cattle enclosure in the centre of the town, ich although it could be used to protect beasts in case of ergency, also served the practical purpose of a public lare.

Here some ceremony was in progress, for soldiers stood and the kraal while heralds pranced and shouted. At the ad of the place in front of the chief's big hut was a little sup of people, among whom a big, gaunt man sat upon a of clad in warrior's dress with a great and very long axe fted with wire-lashed rhinoceros horn, laid across his knees. Our guides led me, with Hans sneaking after me like a jected and low-bred dog (for the waggon had stopped oute the gate), across the kraal to where the heralds shouted the big man sat yawning. At once I noted that he was a ry remarkable person, broad and tall and spare of frame, th long, tough-looking arms and a fierce face which rended me of that of the late King Dingaan. Also he had a eat hole in his head above the temple where the skull had en driven in by some blow, and keen, royal-looking eyes.

He looked up and seeing me, cried out,

'What! Has a white man come to fight me for the chieftainship of the People of the Axe? Well, he is a small one.'

'No,' I answered quietly, 'but Macumazahn, Watcher-by-Night, has come to visit you in answer to your request. O Umslopogaas; Macumazahn whose name was known in this land before yours was told of, O Umslopogaas.'

axe in salute.

'I greet you, O Macumazahn,' he said, 'who although you are small in stature, are very great indeed in fame. Have I not heard how you conquered Bangu, although Saduko slew him, and of how you gave up the six hundred head of cattle to Tshoza and the men of the Amangwane who fought with you, the cattle that were your own? Have I not heard how you led the Tulwana against the Usutu and stamped flat three of Cetywayo's regiments in the days of Panda, although alas! because of an oath of mine I lifted no steel in that battle, I who will have nothing to do with those that spring from the blood of Senzangacona-perhaps because I smell too strongly of it, Macumazahn. Oh! yes, I have heard these and many other things concerning you, though until now it has never been my fortune to look upon your face, O Watcher-by-Night. and therefore I greet you well, Bold onc, Cunning onc. Upright one, Friend of us Black People."

'Thank you,' I answered, 'but you said something about fighting. If there is to be anything of the sort, let us get it over. If you want to fight, I am quite ready,' and I tapped the rifle which I carried.

The grim Chief broke into a laugh and said,

'Listen. By an ancient law any man on this day in each year may fight me for this Chieftainship, as I fought and conquered him who held it before me, and take it from me with my life and the axe, though of late none seems to like the business. But that law was made before there were guns, or men like Macumazahn who, it is said, can hit a lizard on a wall at fifty paces. Therefore I tell you that if you wish to fight me with a rifle, O Macumazahn, I give in and you may have the chieftainship,' and he laughed again in his fierce fashion.

I think it is too hot for fighting either with guns or axes, and Chieftainships are honey that is full of stinging bees. I answered.

Then I took my seat on a stool that had been brought for

UMSLOPOGAAS OF THE AXE

Next morning at the dawn guides arrived from the Town of the Axe, bringing with them a yoke of spare oxen, which showed that its Chief was really anxious to see me. So in due course we inspanned and started, the guides leading us by a rough but practicable road down the steep hillside to the saucer-like plain beneath, where I saw many cattle grazing. Travelling some miles across this plain, we came at last to a river of no great breadth, that encircled a considerable Kaffir town on three sides, the fourth being protected by a little line of koppies which were joined together with walls. lect these matters and therefore in the end they fall into a pit."

'Yes,' I answered, 'especially those who have the lion's blood in them, whether that lion be man or beast."

This I said because of the rumours I had heard that this Slaughterer was in truth the son of Chaka. Therefore not knowing whether or no he were playing on the word 'lion,' which was Chaka's title, I wished to draw him, especially as I saw in his face a great likeness to Chaka's brother Dingaan, whom it was whispered, this same Umslopogaas had slain. As it happened I failed, for after a pause he said,

'Why do you come to visit me, Macumazahn, who have never done so before?'

"I do not come to visit you, Umslopogaas. That was not my intention. You brought me, or rather the flooded rivers and you together brought me, for I was on my way to Natal and could not cross the drifts."

'Yet I think you have a message for me, White Man, for not long ago a certain wandering witch-doctor who came here told me to expect you and that you had words to say to me.'

'Did he, Umslopogaas? Well, it is true that I have a message, though it is one that I did not mean to deliver.'

'Yet being here, perchance you will deliver it, Macumazahn, for those who have messages and will not speak them, sometimes come to trouble.'

'Yes, being here, I will deliver it, seeing that so it seems to be fated. Tell me, do you chance to know a certain Small One who is great, a certain Old One whose brain is young, a doctor who is called Opener-of-Roads?'

'I have heard of him, as have my forefathers for generations.'

'Indeed, and if it pleases you to tell me, Umslopogaas, what might be the names of those forefathers of yours, who have heard of this doctor for generations? They must have been short-lived men and as such I should like to know of them.'

'That you cannot,' replied Umslopogans shortly, 'since they are hloning (i.e., not to be spoken) in this land.'

'Indeed,' I said again. 'I thought that rule applied only to the names of kings, but of course I am but an ignorant white man who may well be mistaken on such matters of your Zulu customs.'

Yes, O Macumazahn, you may be mistaken or-you may just heard, namely that of a man called Lousta and of a woman called Monazi. Also I thought of the hints which in her jealous anger and disappointment at her lack of children, this woman had dropped about a plot against him who sat on the throne of Chaka, which of course must mean King Cetywayo himself.

I came to the guest-hut, which proved to be a very good place and clean; also in it I found plenty of food made read for me and for my servants. After eating I slept for a time as it is always my fashion to do when I have nothing else of hand, since who knows for how long he may be kept awake inght? Indeed, it was not until the sun had begun to sin that a messenger came, saying that the Chief desired to see not if I had rested. So I went to his big hut which stood along with a strong sence set round it at a distance, so that not could come within hearing of what was said, even at the do of the hut. I observed also that a man armed with an a kept guard at the gateway in this sence round which wasked from time to time.

The Chief Umslopogaas was seated on a stool by the do of his hut with his rhinoceros-horn handled axe which w fastened to his right wrist by a thong, leaning against I thigh, and a wolfskin hanging from his broad shoulders. Ve grim and fierce he looked thus, with the red light of a sunset playing on him. He greeted me and pointed to anoth stool on which I sat myself down. Apparently he had be watching my eyes, for he said,

"I see that like other creatures which move at night, st as leopards and hyenas, you take note of all, O Watcher-I Night, even of the soldier who guards this place and of wh the sence is set and of how its gate is fashioned."

'Had I not done so I should have been dead long ago, 'Chief.'

'Yes, and because it is not my nature to do so as I shot perchance I shall soon be dead. It is not enough to be fic and foremost in the battle, Macumazahn. He who wo sleep safe and of whom, when he dies, folk will say "He caten" (i.e., he has lived out his life), must do more than the must guard his tongue and even his thoughts; he make the must guard his tongue and even his thoughts; he must the grass; he must trust few, and least of all those who have the Lion's blanthem or who are prone to charge like a buffalo, often the state of the state o casting an eye upon its roof, and muttered to me as he returned.

Once I was caught thus. There lived a certain wife of mine who set her car to the smoke-hole and so brought about the death of many, and among them of herself and of our children. Enter. All is safe. Yet if you talk, speak low.'

So we went into the hut taking the stools with us. and scated ourselves by the fire that burned there on to which Umslopogaas threw chips of resinous wood.

'Now,' he said.

I opened my shirt and by the clear light of the flame showed him the image of Zikali which hung about my neck. He stared at it, though touch it he would not. Then he stood up and lifting his great axe, he saluted the image with the word 'Makosi!' the salute that is given to great wizards because they are supposed to be the home of many spirits. 'It is the big Medicine, the Medicine itself,' he said, 'that which has been known in the land since the time of Senzan-gacona, the father of the Zulu Royal House, and as it is said, before him. "How can that be?' I asked, seeing that this image represents Zikali, Opener-of-Roads, as an old man, and Senzangacona "died many years ago?" 'I do not know,' he answere! "ut it is so. Listen. There was a certain Mopo, or as ? d him, Umbopo, who was Chaka's body-servant me that twice this Medici fathe. was told 'was sent to Chaka, and t' ling of Mopo and son of—was the lady named Baleka?—I know a good deal about you.'

Umslopogaas stared at me and laying his hand upon the great axe, half rose. Then he sat down again.

'I think that this,' and I touched the image of Zikali upon my breast, 'would turn even the blade of the axe named Groan-maker,' I said and paused. As nothing happened, I went on, 'For instance, again I think I know—or have I dreamed it?—that a certain chief, whose mother's name I believe was Baleka—by the way, was she not one of Chaka's "sisters"?—has been plotting against that son of Panda who sits upon the throne, and that his plots have been betrayed, so that he is in some danger of his life.'

'Macumazahn,' said Umslopogaas hoarsely, 'I tell you that did you not wear the Great Medicine on your breast, I would kill you where you sit and bury you beneath the floor of the hut, as one who knows—too much.'

'It would be a mistake, Umslopogaas, one of the many that you have made. But as I do wear the Medicine, the question does not arise, does it?'

Again he made no answer and I went on, 'And now, what about this journey to the north? If indeed I must make it, would you wish to accompany me?'

Umslopogaas rose from the stool and crawled out of the hut, apparently to make some inspection. Presently he returned and remarked that the night was clear although there were heavy storm clouds on the horizon, by which I understood him to convey in Zulu metaphor that it was safe for us to talk, but that danger threatened from afar.

'Macumazahn,' he said, 'we speak under the blanket of the Opener-of-Roads who sits upon your heart, and whose sign you bring to me, as he sent me word that you would, do we not?'

'I suppose so,' I answered. 'At any rate we speak as man to man, and hitherto the honour of Macumazahn has not been doubted in Zululand. So if you have anything to say, Chief Bulalio, say it at once, for I am tired and should like to cat and rest.'

'Good, Macumazahn. I have this to say. I who am the son of one who was greater than he, have plotted to seize the throne of Zululand from him who sits upon that throne. It is true, for I grew weary of my idleness as a petty chief. Moreover, I should have succeeded with the help of Zikali, who hates the House of Senzangacona, though me, who am of its blood, he does not hate, because ever I have striven against that House. But it seems from his message and those words spoken by an angry woman, that I have been betrayed, and that to-night or to-morrow night, or by the next moon, the slayers will be upon me, smiting me before I can smite, at which I cannot grumble.

By whom have you been betrayed, Umslopogaas?'

By that wife of mine, as I think, Macumazahn. Also by Lousta, my blood-brother, over whom she has cast her net and made false to me, so that he hopes to win her whom he has always loved and with her the Chieftainship of the Axe. Now what shall I do?-Tell me, you whose eves can see in the dark.'

I thought a moment and answered, I think that if I were you, I would leave this Lousta to sit in my place for a while as Chief of the People of the Axe, and take a journey north. Umslopogaas. Then if trouble comes from the Great House where a king sits, it will come to Lousta who can show that the People of the Axe are innocent and that you are far away.'

'That is cunning, Macumazahn. There speaks the Great Medicine. If I go north, who can say that I have plotted, and if I leave my betrayer in my place, who can say that I was a traitor, who have set him where I used to sit and left the land upon a private matter? And now tell me of this journey of vours.'

So I told him everything, although until that moment I had not made up my mind to go upon this journey, I who had come here to his kraal by accident, or so it seemed, and by accident had delivered to him a certain message,

'You wish to consult a white witch-doctoress, Macumazahn, who according to Zikali lives far to the north, as to the dead. Now I too, though perchance you will not think it of a black man, desire to learn of the dead; yes, of a certain wife of my youth who was sister and friend as well as wife, whom too I loved better than all the world. Also I desire to learn of a brother of mine whose name I never speak, who ruled the wolves with me and who died at my side on yonder Witch-Mountain, having made him a mat of men to lie on in a great and glorious fight. For of him as of the woman I think all day and dream all night, and I would know if they still live anywhere and I may look to see them again when I have died as a warrior should and as I hope to do. Do you understand, Watcher-by-Night?"

I answered that I understood very well, as his case seemed to be like my own.

'It may happen,' went on Umslopogaas, 'that all this talk of the dead who are supposed to live after they are dead, is but as the sound of wind whispering in the reeds at night, that comes from nowhere and goes nowhere and means nothing. But at least ours will be a great journey in which we shall find adventure and fighting since it is well known in the land that wherever Macumazahn goes there is a plenty of both. Also it seems well for reasons that have been spoken of between us, as Zikali says, that I should leave the country of the Zulus for a while, who desire to die a man's death at the last and not to be trapped like a jackal in a pit. Lastly I think that we shall agree well together though my temper it rough at times, and that neither of us will desert the other in trouble, though of that little yellow dog of yours I am not so sure.'

'I answer for him,' I replied. 'Hans is a true man, cunning also when once he is away from drink.'

Then we spoke of plans for our journey, and of when 254 where we should meet to make it, talking till it was late, after which I went to sleep in the guest-hut.

ND THE AXE

Next day early I left the town of the People of the having bid a formal farewell to Umslopogaas, saying voice that all could hear that as the rivers were still flot I proposed to trek to the northern parts of Zululand trade there until the weather was better. Our private arrament, however, was that on the night of the next full ment happened about four weeks later, we should meet eastern foot of a certain great, flat-topped mountain know both of us, which stands to the north of Zululand but beyond its borders.

So northward I trekked, slowly to spare my oxen, to as I went. The details do not matter, but as it happened with more luck upon that journey than had come my for many a long year. Although I worked on credit nearly all my goods were sold, as owing to my repute I always do in Zululand, I made some excellent bargai cattle and to top up with, bought a large lot of ivory so that really I think it must have been stolen.

All of this, cattle and ivory together, I sent to Na charge of a white friend of mine whom I could trust, whe stuff was sold very well indeed, and the proceeds paid account, the 'trade' equivalents being duly remitted in native vendors.

In fact, my good fortune was such that if I had been stitious like Hans, I should have been inclined to att it to the influence of Zikali's 'Great Medicine.' As I knew it to be one of the chances of a trader's lif accepted it with a shrug as often I had been accuston do in the alternative of losses.

Only one untoward incident happened to me. Of a ga party of the King's soldiers under the command of known Induna or Councillor, arrived and insisted searching my waggon, as I thought at first in connection that cheap let of ivory which had already departed to However, never a word did they say of ivory, nor indea single thing belonging to me taken by them.

I was very indignant and expressed my feelings to the Induna in no measured terms. He on his part was most apologetic, and explained that what he did he was obliged to do 'by the King's orders.' Also he let it slip that he was seeking for a certain 'evil-doer' who, it was thought, might be with me without my knowing his real character, and as this 'evil-doer,' whose name he would not mention, was a very fierce man, it had been necessary to bring a strong guard with

Now I bethought me of Umslopogaas, but merely looked blank and shrugged my shoulders, saying that I was not in the habit of consorting with evil-doers.

Still unsatisfied, the Induna questioned me as to the places where I had been during this journey of mine in the Zulu country. I told him with the utmost frankness, mentioning among others—because I was sure that already he knew all my movements well—the town of the People of the Axe.

Then he asked me if I had seen its Caled a comain time slopogaas or Bulalio. I answer Yes that I had me him there for the first time and there in a var there? neck to appear between its edges. The Induna saw it and his eyes grew big with fear.

'Hide that!' he whispered, 'hide that, lest it should bewitch me. Indeed already I feel as though I were being bewitched.

It is the Great Medicine itself."

'That will certainly happen to you,' I said yawning again, 'if you insist upon my taking a week's trek to visit the Black One, or interfere with me in any way now or afterwards,' and I lifted my hand towards the talisman, looking him steadily in the face.

'Perhaps after all, Macumazahn, it is not necessary for you to visit the King,' he said in an uncertain voice. 'I will go and make report to him that you know nothing of this evil-doer.'

And he went in such a hurry that he never waited to say good-bye. Next morning before the dawn I went also and trekked steadily until I was clear of Zululand.

In due course and without accident, for the weather, which had been so wet, had now turned beautifully fine and dry, we came to the great, flat-topped hill that I have mentioned, trekking thither over high, sparsely-timbered veld that offered few difficulties to the waggon. This peculiar hill, known to such natives as lived in those parts by a long word that means 'Hut-with-a-flat-roof,' is surrounded by forest, for here trees grow wonderfully well, perhaps because of the water that flows from its slopes. Forcing our way through this forest, which was full of game, I reached its eastern foot and there camped, five days before that night of full moon on which I had arranged to meet Umslopogaas.

That I should meet him I did not in the least believe, firstly because I thought it very probable that he would have changed his mind about coming, and secondly for the excellent reason that I expected he had gone to call upon the King against his will, as I had been asked to do. It was evident to me that he was up to his eyes in some serious plot against Cetywayo, in which he was the old dwarf Zikali's partner, or rather, tool; also that his plot had been betrayed, with the result that he was 'wanted' and would have little chance of passing safely through Zululand. So taking one thing with another I imagined that I had seen his grim face and his peculiar, ancient-looking axe for the last time.

To tell the truth I was glad. Although at first the idea had appealed to me a little, I did not want to make this wild-direction of the cattle-kraal woke me up. As it did not recur. I thought that I would go to sleep again. Then an uneasy thought came to me that I could not remember having looked to see whether the entrance was properly closed, as it was my habit to do. It was the same sort of troublesome doubt which in a civilised house makes a man get out of bed and go along the cold passages to the sitting-room to see whether he has put out the lamp. It always proves that he has put it out, but that does not prevent a repetition of the performance next time the perplexity arises.

I reflected that perhaps the noise was caused by the oxen pushing their way through the carelessly-closed entrance, and at any rate that I had better go to see. So I slipped on my boots and coat and went without waking Hans or the boys, only taking with me a loaded, single-barrelled rifle which I used for shooting small buck, with no spare cartridges.

Now in front of the gateway of the cattle-kraal, shading it, grew a single big tree of the wild fig order. Passing under this tree I looked and saw that the gateway was quite securely closed, as now I remembered I had noted at sunset. Then I started to go back but had not stepped more than two or three paces when, in the bright moonlight, I saw the head of my smallest ox, a beast of the Zulu breed, suddenly appear over the top of the wall. About this there would have been nothing particularly astonishing, had it not been for the fact that this head belonged to a dead animal, as I could tell from the closed eyes and the hanging tongue.

'What in the name of goodness—'I began to myself, when my reflections were cut short by the appearance of another head, that of one of the biggest lions I ever saw, which had the ox by the throat, and with the enormous strength that is given to these creatures, by getting its back beneath the body, was deliberately hoisting it over the wall, to drag it away to devour at its leisure.

There was the brute within twelve feet of me, and what is more, it saw me as I saw it, and stopped, still holding the ox by the throat.

'What a chance for Allan Quatermain! Of course he shot it dead,' one can fancy anyone saying who knows me by repute, also that by the gift of God I am handy with a rifle. Well, indeed it should have been, for even with the small-bore piece that I carried, a bullet ought to have pierced through the soft parts of its throat to its brain and to have killed that lion as dead as Julius Caesar. Theoretically the thing was easy enough; indeed, although I was startled for a moment, by the time that I had the rifle to my shoulder I had little fear of the issue, unless there was a miss-fire, especially as the beast seemed so astonished that it remained quite still.

Then the unexpected happened as it generally does in life, particularly in hunting, which, in my case, is a part of life. I fired, but by misfortune the bullet struck the tip of the horn of that confounded ox, which tip either was or at that moment fell in front of the spot on the lion's throat whereat half-unconsciously I had aimed. Result: the ball was turned and, departing at an angle, just cut the skin of the lion's neck deeply enough to hurt it very much and to make it madder than all the hatters in the world.

Dropping the ox, with a most terrific roar it came over the wall at me—I remember that there seemed to be yards of it—I mean of the lion—in front of which appeared a cavernous mouth full of gleaming teeth.

I skipped back with much agility, also a little to one side, because there was nothing else to do, reflecting in a kind of inconsequent way, that after all Zikali's Great Medicine was not worth a curse. The lion landed on my side of the wall and reared itself upon its hind legs before getting to business, towering high above me but slightly to my left.

Then I saw a strange thing. A shadow thrown by the moon flitted past me—all I noted of it was the distorted shape of a great, lifted axe, probably because the axe came first. The shadow fell and with it another shadow, that of a lion's paw dropping to the ground. Next there was a most awful noise of roaring, and wheeling round I saw such a fray as never I shall see again. A tall, grim, black man was fighting the great lion, that now lacked one paw, but still stood upon its hind legs, striking at him with the other.

The man, who was absolutely silent, dodged the blow and hit back with the axe, catching the beast upon the breast with such weight that it came to the ground in a lopsided fashion, since now it had only one fore-foot on which to light.

The axe flashed up again and before the lion could recover itself, or do anything else, fell with a crash upon its skull, sinking deep into the head. After this all was over, for the beast's brain was cut in two.

'I am here at the appointed time, Macumazahn,' said Umslopogaas, for it was he, as with difficulty he dragged the axe from the lion's severed skull, 'to find you watching by night as it is reported that you always do.'

'No,' I retorted, for his tone irritated me, 'you are late, Bulalio, the moon has been up some hours.'

'I said, O Macumazahn, that I would meet you on the night of the full moon, not at the rising of the moon."

'That is true,' I replied, mollified, 'and at any rate you came at a good moment."

'Yes.' he answered. 'though as it happens in this clear light the thing was easy to anyone who can handle an axe. Had it been darker the end might have been different. But, Macumazahn, you are not so clever as I thought, since otherwise you would not have come out against a lion with a toy like that,' and he pointed to the little rifle in my hand.

'I did not know that there was a lion, Umslopogaas.'

'That is why you are not so clever as I thought, since of one sort or another there is always a lion which wise men should be prepared to meet, Macumazahn.'

'You are right again,' I replied.

At that moment Hans arrived upon the scene, followed at a discreet distance by the waggon boys, and took in the situation at a glance.

'The Great Medicine of the Opener-of-Roads has worked well,' was all he said.

'The great medicine of the Opener-of-Heads has worked better,' remarked Umslopogaas with a little laugh and pointing to his red axe. 'Never before since she came into my keeping has Inkosikaas (i.e., 'Chieftainess,' for so was this famous weapon named) sunk so low as to drink the blood of beasts. Still, the stroke was a good one so she need not be ashamed. But, Yellow Man, how comes it that you who, I have been told, are cunning, watch your master so ill?'

"I was asleep,' stuttered Hans indignantly.

Those who serve should never sleep,' replied Umslopogaas sternly. Then he turned and whistled, and behold! out of the long grass that grew at a little distance, emerged twelve great men, all of them bearing axes and wearing cloaks of hyena skins, who saluted me by raising their axes.

'Set a watch and skin me this beast by dawn. It will make us a mat,' said Umslopogaas, whereon again they saluted silently and melted away.

'Who are these?' I asked.

'A few picked warriors whom I brought with me, Macumazahn. There were one or two more, but they got lost on the way.'

Then we went to the waggon and spoke no more that night.

Next morning I told Umslopogaas of the visit I had received from the Induna of the King who wished me to come to the royal kraal. He nodded and said,

'As it chances certain thieves attacked me on my journey, which is why one or two of my people remain behind who will never travel again. We made good play with those thieves; not one of them escaped,' he added grimly, 'and their bedies we threw into a river where are many crocodiles. But their spears I brought away and I think that they are such as the King's guard use. If so, his search for them will be long, since the fight took place where no man lives and we burned the shields and trappings. Oho! he will think that the ghosts have taken them.'

That morning we trekked on fast, fearing lest a regiment searching for these 'thieves' should strike and follow our spoor. Luckily the ox that the lion had killed was one of some spare cattle which I was driving with me, so its loss did not inconvenience us. As we went Umslopogaas told me that he had duly appointed Lousta and his wife Monazi to rule the tribe during his absence, an office which they accepted doubtfully, Monazi acting as Chieftainess and Lousta as her head Induna or Councillor.

I asked him whether he thought this wise under all the circumstances, seeing that it had occurred to me since I made the suggestion, that they might be unwilling to surrender power on his return, also that other domestic complications might ensue.

'It matters little, Macumazahn,' he said with a shrug of his great shoulders, 'for of this I am sure, that I have played my part with the People of the Axe and to stop among them would have meant my death, who am a man betrayed. What do I care who love none and now have no children? Still, it is true that I might have fled to Natal with the cattle and there have led a fat and easy life. But ease and plenty I do not desire who would live and fall as a warrior should.

'Never again, mayhap, shall I see the Ghost-Mountain where the wolves ravened and the old Witch sits in stone waiting for the world to die, or sleep in the town of the People of the Axe. What do I want with wives and oxen while I have Inkosikaas the Groan-maker and she is true to me?' he added, shaking the ancient axe above his head so that the sun gleamed upon the curved blade and the hollow gouge or point at the back beyond the shaft socket. Where the Axe goes there go the strength and virtue of the Axe, O Macumazahn.

'It is a strange weapon,' I said.

'Aye, a strange and an old, forged far away, says Zikali, by a warrior-wizard hundreds of years ago, a great fighter who was also the first of smiths and who sits in the Underworld waiting for it to return to his hand when its work is finished beneath the sun. That will be soon, Macumazahn, since Zikali told me that I am the last Holder of the Axe.'

'Did you then see the Opener-of-Roads?' I asked.

'Aye, I saw him. He it was who told me which way to go to escape from Zululand. Also he laughed when he heard how the flooded rivers brought you to my kraal, and sent you a message in which he said that the spirit of a snake had told him that you tried to throw the Great Medicine into a pool, but were stopped by that snake, whilst it was still alive. This, he said, you must do no more, lest he should send another snake to stop you.'

'Did he?' I replied indignantly, for Zikali's power of seeing or learning about things that happened at a distance puzzled and annoyed me.

Only Hans grinned and said,

'I told you so, Baas.'

On we travelled from day to day, meeting with such difficulties and dangers as are common on roadless veld in Africa, but no more, for the grass was good and there was plenty of game, of which we shot what we wanted for meat. Indeed, here in the back regions of what is known as Portuguese South East Africa, every sort of wild animal was so numerous that personally I wished we could turn our journey into a shooting expedition.

But of this Umslopogaas, whom hunting bored, would not hear. In fact, he was much more anxious than myself to carry out our original purpose. When I asked him why, he answered because of something Zikali had told him. What this was he would not say, except that in the country whither we wandered he would fight a great fight and win much honour.

Now Umslopogaas was by nature a fighting man, one who took a positive joy in battle, and like an old Norseman, seemed to think that thus only could a man decorously die. This amazed me, a peaceful person who loves quiet and a home. Still, I gave way, partly to please him, partly because we were following an old trade route made, perhaps, in forgotten ages when Africa was more civilised than it is now.

Passing over certain high, misty lands during the third week of our trek, where frequently at this season of the year the sun never showed itself before ten o'clock and disappeared at three or four in the afternoon, and where twice we were held up for two whole days by dense fog, we came across a queer nomadic people who seemed to live in movable grass huts and to keep great herds of goats and long-tailed sheep.

These folk ran away from us at first, but when they found that we did them no harm, became friendly and brought us offerings of milk, also of a kind of slug or caterpillar which they seemed to eat. Hans, who was a great master of different native dialects, discovered a tongue, or a mixture of tongues, in which he could make himself understood to some of them

They told him that in their day they had never seen a white man, although their fathers' fathers (an expression by which they meant their remote ancestors) had known many of them. They added, however, that if we went on steadily towards the north for another seven days' journey, we should come to a place where a white man lived, one, they had heard, who had a long beard and killed animals with guns, as we did.

Encouraged by this intelligence we pushed forward, now travelling down hill out of the mists into a more genial country. Indeed, the veld here was beautiful, high, rolling plains like those of the East African plateau, covered with a deep and fertile chocolate-coloured soil, as we could see where the rain had washed out dongas. The climate, too, seemed to be cool and very healthful. Altogether it was a pity to see such lands lying idle and tenanted only by countless herds of game, for there were not any native inhabitants, or at least

On we trekked, our road still sloping slightly down hill, till at length we saw far away a vast sea of bush-veld which, as I guessed correctly, must fringe the great Zambesi River. Moreover we, or rather Hans, whose eyes were those of a hawk, saw something else, namely buildings of a more or less civilised kind, which stood among trees by the side of a stream several miles on this side of the great belt of bush.

'Look, Baas,' said Hans, 'those wanderers did not lie; there is the house of the white man. I wonder if he drinks anything stronger than water, he added with a sigh and a kind of reminiscent contraction of his yellow throat.

INEZ

We had sighted the house from far away shortly after sunrise and by midday we were there. As we approached I saw that it stood almost immediately beneath two great baobab trees. babyan trees we call them in South Africa, perhaps because monkeys eat their fruit. It was a thatched house with whitewashed walls and a stoep or veranda round it, apparently of the ordinary Dutch type. Moreover, beyond it, at a little." distance were other houses or rather shanties with waggon sheds, etc., and beyond and mixed up with these a number of native huts. Further on were considerable fields green with springing corn; also we saw herds of cattle grazing on the slopes. Evidently our white man was rich.

Umslopogaas surveyed the place with a soldier's eye and said to me.

'This must be a peaceful country, Macumazahn, where no attack is feared, since of defences I see none.'

'Yes,' I answered, 'why not, with a wilderness behind it and bush-veld and a great river in front?'

'Men can cross rivers and travel through bush-veld,' he answered, and was silent.

Up to this time we had seen no one, although it might have been presumed that a waggon trekking towards the house was a sufficiently unusual sight to have attracted attention.

'Where can they be?' I asked.

'Asleep, Baas, I think,' said Hans, and as a matter of fact he was right. The whole population of the place was indulging in a noonday siesta.

At last we came so near to the house that I halted the waggon and descended from the driving-box in order to investigate. At this moment someone did appear, the sight of whom astonished me not a little, namely, a very strikinglooking young woman. She was tall, handsome, with large dark eyes, good features, a rather pale complexion, and I think the saddest face that I ever saw. Evidently she heard the noise of the waggon and had come out to see caused it, for she had nothing on her head, which was covered with thick hair of a raven blackness. Catching sight of the great Umslopogaas with his gleaming axe and of his savagelooking bodyguard, she uttered an exclamation and not unnaturally turned to fly.

'It's all right,' I sang out, emerging from behind the oxen, and in English, though before the words had left my lips I reflected that there was not the slightest reason to suppose that she would understand them. Probably she was Dutch, or Portuguese, although by some instinct I had addressed her in English.

To my surprise she answered me in the same tongue, snoken, it is true, with a peculiar accent which I could not place, as it was neither Scotch nor Irish.

'Thank you,' she said. 'I, sir, was frightened. Your friends look- Here she stumbled for a word, then added, "terrocions."

I laughed at this composite adjective and answered.

'Well, so they are in a way, though they will not harm you or me. But, young lady, tell me, can we outspan here? Perhaps your husband---

'I have no husband, I have only a father, sir,' and she sighed. Well, then, could I speak to your father? My name is Allan Quatermain and I am making a journey of exploration, to find out about the country beyond, you know.

Yes, I will go to wake him. He is asleep. Everyone sleeps here at midday except me, she said with another sigh.

'Why do you not follow their example?' I asked jocosely, for this young woman puzzled me and I wanted to find out about her.

Because I sleep little, sir, who think too much. There will be plenty of time to sleep soon for all of us, will there

I stared at her and inquired her name, because I did not know what else to say,

'My name is Inez Robertson,' she answered. I will go to wake my father. Meanwhile please unyoke your oxen. They can feed with the others; they look as though they wanted rest, poor things.' Then she turned and went into the house.

'Inez Robertson,' I said to myself, 'that's a queer combination. English father and Portuguese mother, I suppose. But what can an Englishman be doing in a place like this? If it had been a trek-Boer I should not have been surprised. Then I began to give directions about outspanning.

We had just got the oxen out of the yokes, when a big, raw-boned, red-bearded, blue-eyed, roughly-clad man of about fifty years of age appeared from the house, yawning. I threw my eye over him as he advanced with a peculiar rolling gait, and formed certain conclusions. A drunkard who has once been a gentleman, I reflected to myself, for there was something peculiarly dissolute in his appearance, also one who has had to do with the sea, a diagnosis which proved very accurate.

'How do you do, Mr. Allan Quatermain, which I think my daughter said is your name, unless I dreamed it, for it is one that I seem to have heard before,' he exclaimed with a broad Scotch accent which I do not attempt to reproduce. 'What in the name of blazes brings you here where no real white man has been for years? Well, I am glad enough to see you any way, for I am sick of half-breed Portuguese and niggers, and snuff-and-butter girls, and gin and bad whiskey. Leave your people to attend to those oxen and come in and have a drink.'

'Thank you, Mr. Robertson---'

'Captain Robertson,' he interrupted. 'Man, don't look astonished. You mightn't guess it, but I commanded a mail-steamer once and should like to hear myself called rightly again before I die.'

'I beg your pardon—Captain Robertson, but myself, I don't drink anything before sundown. However, if you have something to eat—?'

'Oh yes, Inez—she's my daughter—will find you a bite. Those men of yours,' and he also looked doubtfully at Umslopogaas and his savage company, 'will want food as well. I'll have a beast killed for them; they look as if they could cat it, horns and all. Where are my people? All asleep, I suppose, the lazy lubbers. Wait a bit, I'll wake them up.'

Going to the house he snatched a great sjambok cut from hippopotamus hide, from where it hung on a nail in the wall and ran towards the group of huts which I have mentioned roaring out the name Thomaso, also a string of oaths such as seamen use, mixed with others of a Portuguese variety. What happened there I could not see because boughs were in the way, but presently I heard blows and screams, and caught sight of people, all dark-skinned, flying from the huts.

A little later a fat, half-breed man—I should say from his curling hair that his mother was a negress and his father a Portuguese,—appeared with some other nondescript fellows and began to give directions in a competent fashion about our oxen, also as to the killing of a calf. He spoke in bastard Portuguese, which I could understand, and I heard him talk of Umslopogaas to whom he pointed, as 'that nigger,' after the fashion of such cross-bred people who choose to consider themselves white men. Also he made uncomplimentary remarks about Hans, who of course understood every word he said. Evidently Thomaso's temper had been ruffled by this sudden and violent disturbance of his nan.

Just then our host reappeared puffing with his exertions and declaring that he had stirred up the swine with a vengeance in proof of which he pointed to the siambok that was reddened with blood.

'Captain Robertson,' I said, 'I wish to give you a hint to be passed on to Mr. Thomaso, if that is he. He spoke of the Zulu soldier there as a nigger, etc. Well, he is a chief of high rank and rather a terrible fellow if roused. Therefore I recommend Mr. Thomaso not to let him understand that he is insulting him.

'Oh! that's the way of these "snuff-and-butters" one of whose grandmothers once met a white man,' replied the Captain, laughing, 'but I'll tell him,' and he did in Portuguese.

His retainer listened in silence, looking at Umslopogaas rather sulkily. Then we walked into the house. As we went the Captain said.

'Señor Thomaso-he calls himself Señor-is my manager here and a clever man, honest too in his way and attached to me, perhaps because I saved his life once. But he has a nasty temper, as have all these cross-breeds, so I hope he won't get wrong with that native who carries a big axe.'

'I hope so too, for his own sake,' I replied emphatically. The Captain led the way into the sitting-room: there was but one in the house. It proved a queer kind of place with rude furniture seated with strips of hide after the Boer fashion, and yet bearing a certain air of refinement which was doubtless due to Inez, who, with the assistance of a stout native girl, was already engaged in setting the table. Thus there was a shelf with books, Shakespeare was one of these, I noticed—over which hung an ivory crucifix, which suggested that Inez was a Catholic. On the walls, too, were some good portraits, and on the window-ledge a jar full of flowers. Also the forks and spoons were of silver, as were the mugs, and engraved with a tremendous coat-of-arms and a Portuguese motto.

Presently the food appeared, which was excellent and

I felt inclined to ask how I could possibly help in such a matter, but thought it wisest to say nothing. This, however, he did not notice, for he went on,

'Now I think I will have a nap, as I do my work in the early morning, and sometimes late at night when my brain seems to clear up again, for you see I was a sailor for many years and accustomed to keeping watches. You'll look after yourself, won't you, and treat the place as your own?' Then he vanished into the house to lie down.

When I had finished my pipe I went for a walk. I irst I visited the waggon where I found Umslopogaas and his company engaged in cooking the beast that had been given them. Zulu fashion: Hans with his usual cunning had already secured a meal, probably from the servants, or from Inez herself; at least he left them and followed me. First we went down to the huts, where we saw a number of good-looking young women of mixed blood, all decently dressed and engaged about their household duties. Also we saw four or five boys and girls, to say nothing of a baby in arms, fine young people, one or two of whom were more white than coloured.

'Those children are very like the Baas with the red beard,' remarked Hans reflectively.

'Yes,' I said, and shivered, for now I understood the awfulness of this poor man's case. He was the father of a number of half-breeds who tied him to this spot as anchors tie a ship. I went on rather hastily past some sheds to a long, low building which proved to be a store. Here the quarter-blood called Thomaso, and some assistants were engaged in trading with natives from the Zambesi swamps, men of a kind that I had never seen, but in a way more civilised than many further south. What they were selling or buying, I did not stop to see, but I noticed that the store was full of goods of one sort or another, including a great deal of ivory, which, as I supposed, had come down the river from inland.

Then we walked on to the cultivated fields where we saw corn growing very well, also tobacco and other crops. Beyond this were cattle kraals and in the distance we perceived a great number of cattle and goats feeding on the slopes.

'This red-bearded Baas must be very rich in all things,' remarked the observant Hans when we had completed our investigations.

'Yes.' I answered, 'rich and yet poor.'

'How can a man be both rich and yet poor, Baas?' asked Hans.

Just at that moment some of the half-breed children whom I have mentioned, ran past us more naked than dressed and whooping like little savages. Hans contemplated them gravely, then said

'I think I understand now, Baas. A man may be rich in things he loves and yet does not want, which makes him poor in other ways."

'Yes,' I answered, 'as you are, Hans, when you take too much to drink.'

Just then we met the stately Miss Inez returning from the store, carrying some articles in a basket, soap, I think, and tea in a packet, amongst them. I told Hans to take the basket and bear it to the house for her. He went off with it and, talking slowly, we fell into conversation.

'Your father must do very well here,' I said, nodding at he store with the crowd of natives round it.

'Yes,' she answered, 'he makes much money which he puts n a bank at the coast, for living costs us nothing and there s great profit in what he buys and sells, also in the crops te grows and in the cattle. But,' she added pathetically, what is the use of money in a place like this?'

'You can get things with it,' I answered vaguely.

'That is what my father says, but what does he get? Strong stuff to drink; dresses for those women down there, and sometimes pearls, jewels and other things for me which I do not want. I have a box full of them set in ugly gold, or loose which I cannot use, and if I put them on, who is there to see them? That clever half-breed, Thomaso—for he is elever in his way, faithful too—or the women down there—no one clse.'

'You do not seem to be happy, Miss Inez'

'No. I cannot tell how unhappy others are, who have met none, but sometimes I think that I must be the most miserable woman in the world.'

'Oh! no,' I replied cheerfully, 'plenty are worse off.'

'Then, Mr. Quatermain, it must be because they cannot feel. Did you ever have a father whom you loved?'

'Yes, Miss Inez. He is dead, but he was a very good man, a kind of saint. Ask my servant, the little Hottentot

Hans; he will tell you about him.'

'Ah! a very good man. Well, as you may have guessed, mine is not, though there is much good in him, for he has a kind heart, and a big brain. But the drink and those women down there, they ruin him, and she wrung her hands.

'Why don't you go away?' I blurted out.

Because it is my duty to stop. That is what my religion teaches me, although of it I know little except through books, who have seen no priest for years except one who was a missionary, a Baptist. I think, who told me that my faith was false and would lead me to hell. Yes, not understanding how I lived, he said that, who did not know that hell is here. No, I cannot go, who hope always that still God and the Saints will show me how to save my father, even though it be with my blood. And now I have said too much to you who are quite a stranger. Yet, I do not know why I feel that you will not betray me, and what is more, that you will help me if you can, since you are not one of those who drink, or—' and she waved her hand towards the buts.

'I have my faults, Miss Inez.' I answered.

'Yes, no doubt, else you would be a saint, not a man, and even the saints had their faults, or so I seem to remember, and became saints by repentance and conquering them. Still I am sure that you will help me if you can.'

Then with a sudden flash of her dark eyes that said more than all her words, she turned and left me.

Here's a pretty kettle of fish, thought I to myself as I strolled back to the waggon to see how things were going on there, and how to get the live fish out of the kettle before they boil or spoil is more than I know. I wonder why fate is always finding me such jobs to do.

Even as I thought thus a voice in my heart seemed to echo that poor girl's words—because it is your duty—and to add others to them—woe betide him who neglects his duty. I was appointed to try to hook a few fish out of the vast kettle of human woe, and therefore I must go on hooking. Meanwhile this particular problem seemed beyond me. Perhaps Fate would help, I reflected. As a matter of fact in the end Fate did, if Fate is the right word to use in this connection.

THE SEA-COW HUNT Now it had been my intention to push forward across the river at once, but here luck, or our old friend, Fate, we against me. To begin with several of Umslopogaas' men fe sick with a kind of stomach trouble, arising no doubt from something they had eaten. This, however, was not their view or that of Umslopogaas himself. It happened that one these men, Goroko by name, who practised as a witch-doct in his lighter moments, naturally suspected that a spell he been cast upon them, for such people see magic in everythin

Therefore he organised a 'smelling-out' at which Umslor gaas, who was as superstitious as the rest, assisted. So d Hans, although he called himself a Christian, partly out curiosity, for he was as curious as a magpie, and par from fear lest some implication should be brought again him in his absence. I saw the business going on from a lit distance and, unseen myself, thought it well to keep an a upon the proceedings in case anything untoward should occ This I did with Miss Inez, who had never witnessed anyth of the sort, as a companion.

The circle, a small one, was formed in the usual fashi Goroko rigged up in the best witch-doctor's costume that could improvise, duly came under the influence of his 'Spi and skipped about, waving a wildebesste's tail, and so fo

Finally to my horror he broke out of the ring, and runn to a group of spectators from the village, switched Thom who was standing among them with a lordly and contempous air, across the face with the gnu's tail, shouting out he was the wizard who had poisoned the bowels of the men. Thereon Thomaso, who although he could be insollike most crossbreeds was not remarkable for courage, sethe stir that this announcement created amongst the fie faced Zulus and fearing developments, promptly bolted, rattempting to follow him.

After this, just as I thought that everything was over that the time had come for me to speak a few earnest w to Umslopogaas, pointing out that matters must go no further as regards Thomaso, whom I knew that he and his people hated. Goroko went back to the circle and was seized with a new burst of inspiration Throwing down his whisk, he lifted his arms above his head and stared at the heavens. Then he began to shout out something in a loud voice which I was too far off to catch. Whatever it may have been, evidently it frightened his hearers, as I could see from the expressions of their faces. Even Umslopogaas was alarmed, for he let his axe fall for a moment, rose as though to speak, then sat down again and covered his eyes with his hands.

In a minute it was over; Goroko seemed to become normal, took some snuff and as I guessed, after the usual fashion of these doctors, began to ask what he had been saving while the 'Spirit' possessed him, which he either had, or affected to have, forgotten. The circle, too, broke up and its members began to talk to each other in a subdued way, while Umslopogaas remained scated on the ground, brooding, and Hans slipped away in his snake-like fashion, doubtless in search of me.

'What was it all about, Mr. Quatermain?' asked Inez. 'Oh! a lot of nonsense,' I said. 'I fancy that witch-doctor declared that your friend Thomaso put something into those men's food to make them sick."

'I daresay that he did; it would be just like him, Mr. Quatermain, as I know that he hates them, especially Umslopogaas, of whom I am very fond. He brought me some beautiful flowers this morning which he had found somewhere, and made a long speech which I could not understand.

The idea of Umslopogaas, that man of blood and iron, bringing flowers to a young lady, was so absurd that I broke out laughing and even the sad-faced Inez smiled. Then she left me to see about something and I went to speak to Hans and asked him what had happened.

'Something rather queer, I think, Baas,' he answered vacuously, 'though I did not quite understand the last part. The doctor, Goroko, smelt out Thomaso as the man who had made them sick, and though they will not kill him because we are guests here, those Zulus are very angry with Thomaso and I think will beat him if they get a chance. But that is only the small half of the stick," and he r

'What is the big half, then?' I ask

Baas, the Spirit in Goroko-

'The jackass in Goroko, you mean, I interrupted. 'How can you, who are a Christian, talk such rubbish about spirits?

I only wish that my father could hear you."

Oh! Baas, your reverend father, the Predikant, is now wise enough to know all about Spirits and that there are some who come into black witch-doctors though they turn up their noses at white men and leave them alone. However, whatever it is that makes Goroko speak, got hold of him so that his lips said, though he remembered nothing of it afterwards, that soon this place would be red with blood—that there would be a great killing here, Baas. That is all.'

'Red with blood! Whose blood? What did the fool mean?'
'I don't know, Baas, but what you call the jackass in Goroko, declared that those who are "with the Great Medicine"—meaning what you wear, Baas—will be quite safe. So I hope that it will not be our blood; also that you will get out of this place as soon as you can.'

Well, I scolded Hans because he believed in what this doctor said, for I could see that he did believe it, and then went to question Umslopoguas, whom I found looking quite pleased, which annoyed me still more.

What is it that Goroko has been saying and why do you smile, Bulalio?' I asked.

'Nothing much, Macumazahn, except that the man who looks like tallow that has gone bad, put something in our food which made us sick, for which I would kill him were he not Red-beard's servant and that it would frighten the lady his daughter. Also he said that soon there will be fighting, which is why I smiled, who grow weary of peace. We came out to fight, did we not?'

'Certainly not,' I answered. 'We came out to make a quiet journey in strange lands, which is what I mean to do.'

'Ah! well, Macumazahn, in strange lands one meets strange men with whom one does not always agree, and then Inkosikaas begins to talk,' and he whirled the great axe round his head, making the air whistle as it was forced through the gouge at its back.

I could get no more out of him, so having extracted a promise from him that nothing should happen to Thomaso who, I pointed out, was probably quite unjustly accused, I went away.

Still, the whole incident left a disagreeable impression on my mind and I began to wish that we were safe across the Zambesi without more trouble. But we could not start at once because two of the Zulus were still not well enough to travel and there were many preparations to be made about the loads, and so forth, since the waggon must be left behind. Also, and this was another complication—Hans had a sore upon his foot resulting from the prick of a poisonous thorn, and it was desirable that this should be quite healed before we marched.

So it came about that I was really glad when Captain Robertson suggested that we should go down to a certain swamp formed, I gathered, by some small tributary of the Zambesi to take part in a kind of hippopotames battle. It seemed that at this season of the year these great animals always frequented the place in numbers, also that by barring a neck of deep water through which they gained it, they, or a proportion of them, could be cut off and killed.

This had been done once or twice in the past, though not of late, perhaps because Captain Robertson had lacked the energy to organise such a hunt. Now he wished to do so again, taking advantage of my presence, both because of the value of the hides of the sea-cows which were cut up to be sent to the coast and sold as sjamboks or whips, and because of the sport of the thing. Also I think he desired to show me that he was not altogether sunk in sloth and drink.

I fell in with the idea readily enough, since in all my hunting life I had never seen anything of the sort, especially as I was told that the expedition would not take more than a week and I reckoned that the sick men and Hans would not be fit to travel sooner. So great preparations were made. The riverside natives, whose share of the spoil was to be the carcases of the slain sea-cows, were summoned by hundreds and sent off to their appointed stations to beat the swamps at a signal given by the firing of a great pile of reeds. Also many other things were done upon which I need not enter.

Then came the time for us to depart to the appointed spot over twenty miles away, most of which distance it seemed we could trek in the waggon. Captain Robertson, who for the time had cut off his gin, was as active about the affair as though he were once more in command of a mail-steamer. Nothing escaped his attention; indeed, in the care which he gave to details he reminded me of the captain of a great ship that is leaving port, and from it I learned how able a man he must once have been.

Does your daughter accommon was I acked on the night before we started.

'Oh! no,' he answered, 'she would only be in the way. She will be quite safe here, especially as Thomaso, who is no hunter, remains in charge of the place with some of the older natives to look after the women and children.'

Later I saw Inez herself, who said that she would have liked to come, although she hated to see great beasts killed, but that her father was against it because he thought she might catch fever. So she supposed that she had better remain where she was.

I agreed, though in my heart I was doubtful, and said that I would leave Hans, whose foot was not as yet quite well, and with whom she had made friends as she had done with Umslopogaas, to look after her. Also there would be with him the two great Zulus who were now recovering from their attack of stomach sickness, so that she would have nothing to fear. She answered with her slow smile that she feared nothing, still, she would have liked to come with us. Then we parted, as it proved for a long time.

It was quite a ceremony. Umslopogaas, in the name of the Axe' solemnly gave over Inez to the charge of his two followers, bidding them guard her with so much earnestness that I began to suspect he feared something which he did not choose to mention. My mind went back indeed to the prophecy of the witch-doctor Goroko, of which it was possible that he might be thinking, but as while he spoke he kept his fierce eyes fixed upon the fat and pompous quarter-breed, Thomaso. I concluded that here was the object of his doubts.

It might have occurred to him that this Thomaso would take the opportunity of her father's absence to annoy Inez. If so I was sure that he was mistaken for various reasons, of which I need only quote one, namely, that even if such an idea had ever entered his head, Thomaso was far too great a coward to translate it into action. Still, suspecting something. I also gave Hans instructions to keep a sharp eye on Inez and generally to watch the place, and if he saw anything suspicious, to communicate with us at once.

'Yes, Baas,' said Hans, 'I will look after "Sad-Eyes"—for so with their usual quickness of observation our Zulus had named Inez—as though she were my grandmother, though what there is to fear for her, I do not know. But, Baas, I would much rather come and look after you, as your reverend father, the Predikant, told me to do always, which is my duty, not girl-herding, Baas Also my foot is now quite well and—I want to shoot sea-cows, and——' Here he paused.

'And what, Hans?'

'And Goroko said that there was going to be much fighting and if there should be fighting and you should come to harm because I was not there to protect you, what would your reverend father think of me then?'

All of which meant two things: that Hans never liked being separated from me if he could help it, and that he much preferred a shooting trip to stopping alone in this strange place with nothing to do except eat and sleep. So I concluded, though indeed I did not get quite to the bottom of the business. In reality Hans was putting up a most gallant moral struggle against temptation.

As I found out afterwards, Captain Robertson had been giving him strong drink on the sly, moved thereto by sympathy with a fellow toper. Also he had shown him where, if he wanted it, he could get more, and Hans always wanted gin very badly indeed. To leave it within his reach was like leaving a handful of diamonds lying about in the room of a thief. This he knew, but was ashamed to tell me the truth, and thence came much trouble.

'You will stop here, Hans, look after the young lady and nurse your foot,' I said sternly, whereon he collapsed with a sigh and asked for some tobacco.

Meanwhile Captain Robertson, who I think had been taking a stirrup cup to cheer him on the road, was making his farewells down in what was known as 'the village,' for I saw him there kissing a collection of half-breed children, and giving Thomaso instructions to look after them and their mothers. Returning at length, he called to Inez, who remained upon the veranda, for she always seemed to shrink from her father after his visits to the village, to 'keep a stiff upper lip' and not feel lonely, and commanded the cavalcade to start.

So off we went, about twenty of the village natives, a motley crew armed with every kind of gun, marching ahead and singing songs. Then came the waggon with Captain Robertson and myself seated on the driving-box, and lastly Umslopogaas and his Zulus, except the two who had box left behind.

We trekked along a kind of n the same character as that on wh the lower-lying bush-veld which r our right. Before nightfall we came to a ridge whereon this bush-veld turned south, fringing that tributary of the great river in the swamps of which we were to hunt for sea-cows. Here we camped and next morning, leaving the waggon in charge of my voorlooper and a couple of the Strathmuir natives, for the driver was to act as my gun-bearer—we marched down into the sea of bush-veld. It proved to be full of game, but at this we dared not fire for fear of disturbing the hippopotami in the swamps beneath, whence in that event they might escape us back to the river.

About midday we passed out of the bush-veld and reached the place where the drive was to be. Here, bordered by steep banks covered with bush, was swampy ground not more than two hundred yards wide, down the centre of which ran a narrow channel of rather deep water, draining a vast expanse of morass above. It was up this channel that the sea-cows travelled to the feeding ground where they loved to collect at that season of the year.

There with the assistance of some of the riverside natives we made our preparations under the direction of Captain Robertson. The rest of these men, to the number of several hundreds, had made a wide détour to the head of the swamps, miles away, whence they were to advance at a certain signal. These preparations were simple. A quantity of thorn trees were cut down and by means of heavy stones fastened to their trunks, anchored in the narrow channel of deep water. To their tops, which floated on the placid surface, were tied a variety of rags which we had brought with us, such as old red flannel shirts, gay-coloured but worn-out blankets, and I know not what besides. Some of these fragments also were attached to the anchored ropes under water.

Also we selected places for the guns upon the steep banks that I have mentioned, between which this channel ran. Foreseeing what would happen, I chose one for myself behind a particularly stout rock and what is more, built a stone wall to the height of several feet on the landward side of it, as I guessed that the natives posted near to me would prove wild in their shooting.

These labours occupied the rest of that day, and at night we retired to higher ground to sleep. Before dawn on the following morning we returned and took up our stations, some on one side of the channel and some on the other which we had to reach in a canoe brought for the purpose by the river natives.

Then, before the sun rose, Captain Robertson fired a huge pile of dried reeds and bushes, which was to give the signal to the river natives far away, to begin their beat. This done, we sat down and waited, after making sure that every gun had plenty of ammunition ready.

As the dawn broke, by climbing a tree near my schanze or shelter, I saw a good many miles away to the south a wide circle of little fires, and guessed that the natives were heginning to burn the dry reeds of the swamp. Presently these fires drew together into a thin wall of flame. Then I knew that it was time to return to the schanze and prepare. It was full daylight, however, before anything happened.

Watching the still channel of water, I saw ripples on it and bubbles of air rising. Suddenly there appeared the head of a great bull-hippopotamus which, having caught sight of our rag barricade, either above or below water, had risen to the surface to see what it might be. I put a bullet from an eight-bore rifle through its brain, whereon it sank, as I guessed, stone dead to the bottom of the channel, thus helping to increase the barricade by the bulk of its great body. Also it had another effect. I have observed that sea-cows cannot bear the smell and taint of blood, which frightens them horribly, so that they will expose themselves to almost any risk, rather than get it into their nostrils.

Now, in this still water where there was no perceptible current, the blood from the dead bull soon spread all about so that when the herd, following their leader, began to arrive they were much alarmed. Indeed, the first of them on winding or tasting it, turned and tried to get back up the channel where, however, they met others following, and there ensued a tremendous confusion. They rose to the surface, blowing, snorting, bellowing and scrambling over each other in the water, while continually more and more arrived behind them, till there was a perfect pandemonium in that narrow place.

All our guns opened fire wildly upon the mass; it was like a battle and through the smoke I caught sight of the riverside natives who were acting as beaters, advancing far away, fantastically dressed, screaming with excitement and waving spears, or sometimes torches of flaming teeds. Most of these were scrambling along the banks, but some of the bolder spirits advanced over the lagoon in canoes, driving the hippopotami towards the mouth of the channel by which alone they could escape into the great swamps below and so on to the river. In all my hunting

I ever saw a more remarkable scene. Still, in a way, to me it was unpleasant, for I flatter myself that I am a sportsman and a battue of this sort is not sport as I understand the term.

At length it came to this; the channel for quite a long way was literally full of hippopotami—I should think there must have been a hundred of them or more of all sorts and sizes, from great bulls down to little calves. Some of these were killed, not many, for the shooting of our gallant company was execrable and almost at hazard. Also for every sea-cow that died, of which number I think that Captain Robertson and myself accounted for most—many were only wounded.

Still, the unhappy beasts, crazed with noise and fire and blood, did not seem to dare to face our frail barricade, probably for the reason that I have given. For a while they remained massed together in the water, or under it, making a most horrible noise. Then of a sudden they seemed to take a resolution. A few of them broke back towards the burning reeds, the screaming beaters and the advancing canoes. On of these, indeed, a wounded bull, charged a canoe, crushed i in its huge jaws and killed the rower, how exactly I do no know, for his body was never found. The majority of them however, took another counsel, for emerging from the wate on either side, they began to scramble towards us along the steep banks, or even to climb up them with surprising agility . It was at this point in the proceedings that I congratulated myself earnestly upon the solid character of the water-work rock which I had selected as a shelter.

Behind this rock together with my gun-bearer and Umslope gaas, who, as he did not shoot, had elected to be my companion, I crouched and banged away at the unwieldy creature as they advanced. But fire fast as I might with two rifles, could not stop the half of them and—they were drawing unpleasantly near. I glanced at Umslopogaas and even then was amused to see that probably for the first time in his life that redoubtable warrior was in a genuine fright.

'This is madness, Macumazahn,' he shouted above the din. 'Are we to stop here and be stamped flat by a horde of water-pigs?'

'It seems so,' I answered, 'unless you prefer to be stamped flat outside—or eaten,' I added, pointing to a great crocodile that had also emerged from the channel and was coming along towards us with open jaws.

'By the Axe!' shouted Umslopogaas again, 'I—a warrior—will not die thus, trodden on like a slug by an ox.'

Now I have mentioned a tree which I climbed. In his extremity Umslopogaas rushed for that tree and went up it like a lamplighter, just as the crocodile wriggled past its trunk, snapping at his retreating legs.

After this I took no more note of him, partly because of the advancing sea-cows, and more for the reason that one of the village natives posted above me, firing wildly, put a large round bullet through the sleeve of my coat. Indeed, had it not been for the wall which I built that protected us, I am certain that both my bearer and I would have been killed, for afterwards I found it splashed over with lead from bullets which had struck the stones.

Well, thanks to the strength of my rock and to the wall, or as Hans said afterwards, to Zikali's Great Medicine, we escaped unhurt. The rush went have entered, I killed one sea-cow so close that the posts from the ritle actually burned its hide. But it did go not to be got withoutened. All, however, were not so fortunate, since of the village natives two were trampled to death, while a third hid his leg broken.

Also, and this was really amusing a bewildered bull charging at full speed, crashed into the trunk of Umslopogaas' tree, and as it was not very thick, snapped it in two. Down came the top in which the dignified chief was ensconced like a bird in a nest, though at that moment there was precious little dignity about him. However, except for scratches he was not hurt, as the hippopotamus had other business in urgent need of attention and did not stop to settle with him.

'Such are the things which happen to a man who mixes himself up with matters of which he knows nothing,' said Umslopogaas sententiously to me afterwards. But all the same he could never bear any allusion to this tree-climbing episode in his martial career, which as it happened, had taken place in full view of his retainers, among whom it remained the greatest of jokes. Indeed, he wanted to kill a man the wag of the party, who gave him a string name which, best translated, means 'He-who-it-poor to e-that-he-darent a-water-horse-up-a-tree.'

It was all over at last, is devoutly. A good many of twenty-one was our exact bag had escaped in one way or an I imagine that at the last the fears and swimming through our screen, passed away down the channel. At any rate they were gone, and having ascertained that there was nothing to be done for the man who had been trampled on my side of the channel, I crossed it in the cance with the object of returning quietly to our camp to rest.

But as yet there was to be no quiet for me, for there I found Captain Robertson, who I think had been refreshing himself out of a bottle and was in a great state of excitement about a native who had been killed near him who was a favourite of his, and another whose leg was broken. He declared vehemently that the hippopotamus which had done-this had been wounded and rushed into some bushes a few hundred vards away, and that he meant to take vengeance upon it.

Indeed, he was just setting off to do so.

Seeing his agitated state I thought it wisest to follow him. What happened need not be set out in detail. It is sufficient to say that he found that hippopotamus and blazed both barrels at it in the bushes, hitting it, but not seriously. Out lumbered the creature with its mouth open, wishing to escape. Robertson turned to fly as he was in its path, but from one cause or another, tripped and fell down. Certainly he would have been crushed beneath its huge feet had I not stepped in front of him and sent two solid eight-bore bullets down that yawning throat, killing it dead within three feet of where Robertson was trying to rise, and I may add, of myself.

This narrow escape sobered him, and I am bound to say that his gratitude was profuse.

You are a brave man,' he said, 'and had it not been for you by now I should be wherever bad people go. I'll not forget it, Mr. Quatermain, and if ever you want anything that John Robertson can give, why, it's yours.'

'Very well,' I answered, being seized by an inspiration,

I do want something that you can give easily enough.'
'Give it a name and it's yours, half my place, if you like.'

'I want,' I went on as I slipped new cartridges into the rifle. 'I want you to promise to give up drink for your daughter's sake. That's what nearly did for you just now, you know.'

'Man, you ask a hard thing,' he said slowly. 'But by God

I'll try for her sake and yours too.'

Then I went to help to set the leg of the injured man, which was all the rest I got that morning.

We spent three more days at that place. First it was necessary to allow time to elapse before the gases which generated in their great bodies caused those of the sea-cows which had been killed in the water, to float. Then they must be skinned and their thick hides cut into strips and pieces to be traded for sjamboks or to make small native shields for which some of the East Coast tribes will pay heavily.

All this took a long while, during which I amused, or disgusted myself in watching those river natives devouring the flesh of the beasts. The lean, what there was of it, they dried and smoked into a kind of 'biltong,' but a great deal of the fat they ate at once. I had the curiosity to weigh a lump which was given to one thin, hungry-looking fellow, It scaled quite twenty pounds. Within four hours he had eaten it to the last ounce and lay there, a distended and torpid log. What would not we white people give for such a digestion!

At last all was over and we started homewards, the man with a broken leg being carried in a kind of litter. On the edge of the bush-veld we found the waggon quite safe, also one of Captain Robertson's that had followed us from Strathmuir in order to carry the expected load of hippopotamus' hides and ivory. I asked my voorlooper if anything had happened during our absence. He answered nothing, but that on the previous evening after dark, he had seen a glow in the direction of Strathmuir which lay on somewhat lower ground about twenty miles away, as though numerous fires had been lighted there. It struck him so much, he added, that he climbed a tree to observe it better. He did not think, however, that any building had been burned there, as the glow was not strong enough for that.

I suggested that it was caused by some grass fire or reedburning, to which he replied indifferently that he did not think so as the line of the glow was not sufficiently continuous.

There the matter ended, though I con made me anxieus, for what exact reason I could not say Umslopogaas also, who had listened to it, for our talk was i Zulu, looked grave, but made no remark. But as since hi tree-climbing experience he had been singularly silent, of thi I thought little.

We had trekked at a time which we calculated would brin us to Strathmuir about an hour before sundown, allowin for a short half way. As my oxen were got in mor quickly than those of the other waggon after this outspan, was the first away, followed at a little distance by Umslopo gaas, who preferred to walk with his Zulus. The truth wa that I could not get that story about the glow of fires out o my mind and was anxious to push on, which had caused me to hurry up the inspanning.

Perhaps we had covered a couple of miles of the ten of twelve which still lay between us and Strathmuir, when far of on the crest of one of the waves of the veld which much resembled those of the swelling sea frozen while in motion, saw a small figure approaching us at a rapid trot. Somehow that figure suggested Hans to my mind, so much so that I fetched my glasses to examine it more closely. A short scrutiny through them convinced me that Hans it was, Hans and no other, advancing at a great pace.

Filled with uneasiness, I ordered the driver to flog up the oxen, with the result that in a little over five minutes we met. Halting the waggon. I leapt from the waggon-box and calling to Umslopogaas who had kept up with us at a slow, swinging trot, went to Hans, who, when he saw me, stood still at a little distance, swinging his apology for a hat in his hand, as was his fashion when ashamed or perplexed.

'What is the matter, Hans?' I asked when we were within speaking distance.

'Oh! Baas, everything,' he answered, and I noticed that he kept his eyes fixed upon the ground and that his lips twitched.

'Speak, you fool, and in Zulu,' I said, for by now Umslopo-gaas had joined me.

'Baas,' he answered in that tongue, 'a terrible thing has come about at the farm of Red-Beard yonder. Yesterday afternoon at the time when people are in the habit of sleeping there till the sun grows less hot, a body of great men with fierce faces who carried big spears—perhaps there were fifty of them, Baas—crept up to the place through the long grass and growing crops, and attacked it.'

'Did you see them come?' I asked.

'No, Baas. I was watching at a little distance as you hade me do and the sun being hot, I shut my eyes to keep out the glare of it, so that I did not see them until they had passed me and heard the noise.'

'You mean that you were asleep or drunk, Hans, but go on.'

'Baas. I do not know,' he answered shamefacedly, 'but after that I climbed a tall tree with a kind of bush at the top of it' (I ascertained afterwards that this was a sort of leafy-crowned palm), 'and from it I saw everything without being seen.'

'What did you see, Hans?' I asked him.

'I saw the big men run up and make a kind of circle round the village. Then they shouted, and the people in the village came out to see what was the matter. Thomaso and some of the men caught sight of them first and ran away fast into the hillside at the back where the trees grow, before the circle was complete. Then the women and children came out and the big men killed them with their spears—all, all!

'Good God!' I exclaimed, 'And what happened at the house and to the lady?'

'Baas, some of the men had surrounded that also and when she heard the noise the lady Sad-Eyes came out on to the stoep and with her came the two Zulus of the Axe who had been left sick but were now quite recovered. A number of the big men ran as though to take her, but the two Zulus made a great fight in front of the little steps to the stoep, having their backs protected by the stoep, and killed six of them before they themselves were killed. Also Sad-Eyes shot one with a pistol she carried, and wounded another so that the spear fell out of his hand.

Then the rest fell on her and tied her up, setting her in a chair on the stoep where two remained to watch her. They did her no hurt, Baas; indeed, they seemed to treat her as gently as they could. Also they went into the house and there they caught that tall fat yellow girl who always smiles and is called Janee, she who waits upon the Lady Sad-Eyes, and brought her out to her. I think they told her, Baas, that she must look after her mistress and that if she tried to run away she would be killed, for afterwards I saw Janee bring her food and other things.

'And then, Hans?'

'Then, Baas, most of the great men rested a while, though some of them went through the store gathering such things as they liked, blankets, knives and iron cooking-pots, but they set fire to nothing, nor did they try to eatch the cattle. Also they took dry wood from the pile and lit big fires, eight or nine of them, and when the sun set they began to feast.

'What did they feast on, Hans, if they took no cattle?' I asked with a shiver, for I was afraid of I knew not what.

'Baas,' answered Hans, turning his head away and looking at the ground, 'they feasted on the children whom they had killed, also on some of the young women. These tall soldiers are men-eaters, Baas.'

At this horrible intelligence I turned faint and felt as though I was going to fall, but recovering myself, signed to him to go on with his story.

'They feasted quite quietly, Baas,' he continued, 'making no noise. Then some of them slept while others watched, and that went on all night. As soon as it was dark, but before the moon rose, I slid down the tree and crept round to the back of the house without being seen or heard, as I can, Baas. I got into the house by the back door and crawled to the window of the sitting-room. It was open and peeping through I saw Sad-Eyes still tied to the seat on the stoep not more than a pace away, while the girl Janee crouched on the floor at her feet—I think she was asleep or fainting.

I made a little noise, like a night-adder hissing, and kept on making it, till at last Sad-Eyes turned her head. Then I spoke in a very low whisper, for fear lest I should wake the two guards who were dozing on either side of her wrapped in their blankets, saying, 'it is I, Hans, come to help you.' 'You cannot,' she answered, also speaking very low. 'Get to your master and tell him and my father to follow. These men are called Amahagger and live far away across the river. They are going to take me to their home, as I understand, to rule them, because they want a white woman to be a queen over them who have always been ruled by a certain white queen, against whom they have rebelled. I do not think they mean to do me any harm, unless perhaps they want to marry me to their chief, but of this I am not sure from their talk which I understand badly. Now go, before they catch you.'

'I think you might get away,' I whispered back. 'I will cut your bonds. When you are free, slip through the window and I will guide you.'

'Very well, try it,' she said.

'So I drew my knife and stretched out my arm. But then, Bass, I showed myself a fool—if the Great Medicine had still been there I might have known better. I forgot the starlight which shone upon the blade of the knife. That girl Janee came out of her sleep or swoon, lifted her head and saw the knife. She screamed once, then at a word from her mistress was silent. But it was enough, for it woke up the guards who glared about them and threatened Janee with their great spears, also they went to sleep no more, but began to talk together, though what they said I could not hear, for I was hiding on the floor of the room. After this, knowing that I could do no good and might do harm and get myself killed, I crept out of the house as I had crept in, and crawled back to my tree.

'Why did you not come to me?' I asked.

Because I still hoped I might be able to help Sad-Eyes, Baas. Also I wanted to see what happened, and I knew that I could not bring you here in time to be any good. Yet it is true I thought of coming though I did not know the road.

'Perhaps you were right.' 'At the first dawn,' continued Hans, 'the great men who are called Amahagger rose and ate what was left over from the night before. Then they gathered themselves together and went to the house. Here they found a large chair, that seated with rimpis in which the Bass Red-Beard sits, and lashed two poles to the chair. Beneath the chair they tied the garments and other things of the Lady Sad-Eyes which they made Jance gather as Sad-Eyes directed her. This done, very gently they sat Sad-Eyes herself in the chair, bowing while they made her fast. After this eight of them set the poles upon their shoulders and they all went away at a trot, heading for the bush-veld, driving with them a herd of goats which they had stolen from the farm, and making Jance run by the chair. I saw everything, Baas, for they passed just beneath my tree. Then I came to seek you, following the outward spoor of the waggons which I could not have done well at night. That is all, Baas.'

'Hans,' I said, 'you have been drinking and because of it the lady Sad-Eyes is taken a prisoner by cannibals; for had you been awake and watching, you might have seen them coming and saved her and the rest. Still, afterwards you did well, and for the rest you must answer to Heaven.'

I must tell your reverend father, the Predikant, Baas, that the white master, Red-Beard, gave me the liquor and it is rude not to do as a great white master does, and drink heart. I am sure he will understand, Baas, said Hans about I thought to myself that it was true and the sheart.

which Robertson cast had fallen upon his own head; as the Zulus say, but I made no answer, lacking time for argument.

'Did you say,' asked Umslopogaas, speaking for the first time, 'that my servants killed only six of these men-eaters?' Hans nodded and answered, 'Yes, six. I counted the bodies.'

'It was ill done, they should have killed six each,' said Umslopogaas moodily. Well, they have left the more for us to finish,' and he fingered the great axe.

Just then Captain Robertson arrived in his waggon, calling out anxiously to know what was the matter, for some premonition of evil seemed to have struck him. My heart sank at the sight of him, for how was I to tell such a story to the father of the murdered children and of the abducted girl?

In the end I felt that I could not. Yes, I turned coward and saving that I must fetch something out of the waggon. bolted into it, bidding Hans go forward and repeat his tale. He obeyed unwillingly enough, and looking out between the curtains of the waggon tent I saw all that happened, though I could not hear the words that passed

Robertson had halted the oxen and jumping from the waggon-box strode forward and met Hans, who began to speak with him, twitching his hat in his hands. Gradually as the tale progressed. I saw the Captain's face freeze into a mask of horror. Then he began to argue and deny, then to weepoh! it was a terrible sight to see that great man weeping over those whom he had lost, and in such a fashion.

After this a kind of blind rage seized him and I thought he sas going to kill Hans, who was of the same opinion, for he ran away. Next he staggered about, shaking his fists, cursing and shouting, till presently he fell of a heap and lay face downwards, beating his head against the ground and groaning. Now I went to him because I must

He saw me coming and sit up

That's a pretty story, Quatermain, which this little yellow monkey has been gibbering at me. Man, do you understand what he says? He says that all those half-blood children of mine are dead, murdered by savages from over the Zambesi, yes, and eaten, too, with their mothers. Do you take the point? Eaten like limbs Those fires your man saw last night were the fires on which they were cooked, my little so-andso and so-and-so,' and he mentioned half a dozen different names. 'Yes, cooked, Quatermain. And that isn't all of it, they have taken Inez too. They didn't eat her, but they have dragged her off a captive for God knows what reason. I couldn't understand. The whole ship's crew is gone, except the captain absent on leave and the first officer. Thomaso, who deserted with some Lascar stokers, and left the women and children to their fate. My God, I'm going mad. I'm going mad! If you have any mercy in you, give me something to drink.

'All right,' I said, 'I will. Sit here and wait a minute.'

Then I went to the waggon and poured out a stiff tot of spirits into which I put an amazing dose of bromide from a little medicine chest I always carry with me, and thirty drops of chlorodyne on the top of it. All of this compound I mixed up with a little water and took it to him in a tin cup so that he could not see the colour.

He drank it at a gulp and throwing the pannikin aside, sat down on the veld, groaning while the company watched him at a respectful distance, for Hans had joined the others and his tale had spread like fire in drought-parched grass.

In a few minutes the drugs began to take effect upon Robertson's tortured nerves, for he rose and said quietly,

'What now?'

'Vengeance, or rather justice,' I answered.

'Yes,' he exclaimed, 'vengeance, I swear that I will be avenged, or die-or both."

Again I saw my opportunity and said, 'You must swear more than that, Robertson. Only sober men can accomplish great things, for drink destroys the judgment. If you wish to be avenged for the dead and to rescue the living, you must be sober, or I for one will not help you.'

Will you help me if I do. to the end, good or ill, Quater-main?' he asked.

I nodded.

'That's as much as another man's oath,' he muttered. 'Still, I will put my thought in words. I swear by God, by my mother—like these natives—and by my daughter born in honest marriage, that I will never touch another drop of strong drink, until I have avenged those poor women and their little children, and rescued Inez from their murderers. If I do you may put a bullet through me.'

'That's all right.' I said in an offhand fashion, though inwardly I glowed with pride at the success of my great idea, for at the time I thought it great, and went on,

Now let us get to business. The first thing to do is to trek to Strathmuir and make preparations; the next to start upon the trail. Come to sit on the waggon with me and tell what guns and ammunition you have got, for according

Hans those savages don't seem to have touched anything. except a few blankets and a herd of goats.'

He did as I asked, telling me all he could remember. Then he said.

'It is a strange thing, but now I recall that about two years ago a great savage with a high nose, who talked a sort of Arabic which, like Inez, I understand, having lived on the coast, turned up one day and said he wanted to trade. I asked him what in, and he answered that he would like to buy some children. I told him that I was not a slave-dealer. Then he looked at Inez, who was moving about, and said that he would like to buy her to be a wife for his Chief, and offered some fabulous sum in ivory and gold, which he said should be paid before she was taken away. I snatched his big spear from his hand, broke it over his head and gave him the best hiding with its shaft that he had ever heard of. Then I kicked him off the place. He limped away but when he was out of reach, turned and called out that one day he would come again with others and take her, meaning Inez, without leaving the price in ivory and gold. I ran for my gun, but when I got back he had gone and I never thought of the matter again from that day to this."

'Well, he kept his promise,' I said, but Robertson made no answer, for by this time that thundering dose of bromide and laudanum had taken effect on him and he had fallen asleep, of which I was glad, for I thought that this sleep would save his reason, as I believe it did for a while.

We reached Strathmuir towards sunset, too late to think of attempting the pursuit that day. Indeed, during our trek, I had thought the matter out carefully and come to the conclusion that to try to do so would be useless. We must rest and make preparations; also there was no hope of our overtaking these brutes who already had a clear twelve hours' start, by a sudden spurt. They must be run down patiently by following on their spoor, if indeed they could be run down at all before they vanished into the vast recesses of unknown Africa. The most we could do this night was to get ready.

Captain Robertson was still sleeping when we passed the village and of this I was heartily glad, since the remains of a cannibal feast are not pleasant to behold, especially when they are—! Indeed, of these I determined to be rid at once, so slipping off the waggon with Hans and some of the farm boys, for none of the Zulus would defile themselves by touching such human remnants—I made up two of the smouldering fires, the light of which the voorlooper had seen upon the sky, and on to them east, or caused to be east, those poor fragments. Also I told the farm natives to dig a big grave and in it to place the other bodies and generally to remove the traces of murder.

Then I went on to the house, and not too soon. Seeing the waggons arrive and having made sure that the Amahagger were gone, Thomaso and the other cowards emerged from their hiding-places and returned. Unfortunately for the former the first person he met was Umslopogaas, who began to revile the fat half-breed in no measured terms, calling him dog, coward, and other opprobrious names, such as deserter of women and children, and so forth—all of which someone translated.

Thomaso, an insolent person, tried to swagger the matter out, saying that he had gone to get assistance. Infuriated at this lie, Umslopogaas leapt upon him with a roar and though he was a strong man, dealt with him as a lion does with a buck. Lifting him from his feet, he hurled him to the ground, then as he strove to rise and run, caught him again and as it seemed to me, was about to break his back across his knee. Just at this juncture I arrived.

'Let the man go,' I shouted to him. 'Is there not enough death here already?'

'Yes,' answered Umslopogaas, 'I think there is. Best that this jackal should live to eat his own shame,' and he cast Thomaso to the ground, where he lay groaning.

Robertson, who was still asleep in the waggon, woke up at the noise, and descended from it, looking dazed. I got him to the house and in doing so made my way past, or rather between the bodies of the two Zulus and of the six men whom they had killed, also of him whom Inez had shot. Those Zulus had made a splendid fight for they were covered with wounds, all of them in front, as I found upon examination.

Having made Robertson lie down upon his bed, I took a good look at the slain Amahagger. They were magnificent men, all of them; tall, spare and shapely with very clear-cut features and rather frizzled hair. From these characteristics, as well as the lightness of their colour, I concluded that they were of a Semitic or Arab type, and that the admixture of their blood with that of the Bantus was but slight, if indeed there were any at all. Their spears, of which one had been cut through by a blow of a Zulu's axe, were long and broad.

not unlike to those used by the Masai, but of finer workmanship.

By this time the sun was setting and thoroughly tired by all that I had gone through, I went into the house to get something to eat, having told Hans to find food and prepare a meal. As I sat down-Robertson joined me and I made him also eat. His first impulse was to go to the cupboard and fetch the. spirit bottle; indeed, he rose to do so.

'Hans is making coffee,' I said warningly.

'Thank you,' he answered, 'I forgot. Force of habit, you know.

Here I may state that never from that moment did I see him touch another drop of liquor, not even when I drank my modest tot in front of him. His triumph over temptation was splendid and complete, especially as the absence of his accustomed potations made him ill for some time and of course depressed his spirits, with painful results that were apparent in due course.

In fact, the man became totally changed. He grew gloomy but resourceful, also full of patience. Only one idea obsessed him-to rescue his daughter and avenge the murder of his neople; indeed, except his sins, he thought of and found interest in nothing else. Moreover, his iron constitution cast off all the effects of his past debauchery and he grew so strong that although I was pretty tough in those days, he could out-

To return: I engaged him in conversation and with his help made a list of what we should require on our vendetta journey, all of which served to occupy his mind. Then I sent him to bed, saying that I would call him before dawn, having first put a little more bromide into his third cup of coffee. After this I turned in and notwithstanding the sight of those remains of the cannibal feast and the knowledge of the dead men who lay outside my window, I slept like a top.

Indeed, it was the Captain who awakened me, not I the Captain, saying that daylight was on the break and we had better be stirring. So we went down to the Store, where I was thankful to find that everything had been tidled up in accordance with my directions.

On our way Robertson asked me what had become of the remains, whereon I pointed to the smouldering ashes of one of the great fires. He went to it and kneeling down, said a prayer in broad Scotch, doubtless one that he had learned at his mother's knee. Then he took some of the ashes from the edge of the pyre—for such it was—and threw them into the glowing embers where, as he knew, lay all that was left of those who had sprung from him. Also he tossed others of them into the air, though what he meant by this I did not understand and never asked. Probably it was some rite indicative of expiation or of revenge, or both, which he had learned from the savages among whom he had lived so long.

After this we went into the Store and with the help of some of the natives, or half-breeds, who had accompanied us on the sea-cow expedition, selected all the goods we wanted, which we sent to the house.

As we returned thither I saw Umslopogaas and his men engaged, with the usual Zulu ceremonies, in burying their two companions in a hole they had made in the hillside. I noted, however, that they did not inter their war-axes or their throwing spears with them as is usual, probably because they thought that these might be needed. In place of them they put with the dead little models roughly shaped of bits of wood, which models they 'killed' by first breaking them across,

I lingered to watch the funeral and heard Goroko, the witch-doctor, make a little speech.

'O Father and Chief of the Axe,' he said, addressing Umslopogaas, who stood silent leaning on his weapon and watching all, a portentous figure in the morning mist, 'O Father, O Son of the Heavens' (this was an allusion to the royal blood of Umslopogaas of which the secret was well known, although it would never have been spoken aloud in Zululand), 'O Slaughterer (Bulalio), O Woodpecker who picks at the hearts of men; O King-Slayer; O Conqueror of the Halakazi; O Victor in a hundred fights; O Gatherer of the Lily-bloom that faded in the hand; O Wolf-man, Captain of the Wolves that ravened; O Slayer of Faku; O Great One whom it pleases to seem small, because he must follow his blood to the end appointed—

This was the opening of the speech, the 'honga-ing' or giving of Titles of Praise to the person addressed, of which I have quoted but a sample, for there were many more of them that I have forgotten. Then the speaker went on,

It is told to me, though of it I remember nothing, that when my Spirit was in me a while ago I prophesied that this place would flow with blood, and lo! the blood has flowed, and with it that of these our brothers, and he gave the names of the two dead Zulus, also those of their forefathers for several generations.

wished them to die, and as doubtless they desired to die themselves, leaving a tale behind them, though it is true that they might have died better, killing more of the men-eaters, as it is certain they would have done, had they not been sick inside. They are finished; they have gone beyond to await us in the Under-world among the ghosts. Their story is told and soon to their children they will be but names whispered in honour after the sun has set. Enough of them who have showed us how to die as our fathers did before them."

'It seems. Father, that they died well, as you would have

Goroko paused a while, then added with a waving of his hands,

'My Spirit comes to me again and I know that these our brothers shall not pass unavenged. Chief of the Axe, great glory waits the Axe, for it shall feed full. I have spoken.'

'Good words!' grunted Umslopogaas. Then he saluted the dead by raising Inkosikaas and came to me to consult about our journey.

PURSUIT

AFTER all we did not get away much before noon, because first there was a great deal to be done. To begin with the loads had to be arranged. These consisted largely of ammunition, everything else being cut down to an irreducible minimum. To carry them we took two donkeys there were on the place, also half a dozen pack oxen, all of which animals were supposed to be 'salted'—that is, to have suffered and recovered from every kind of sickness, including the bite of the deadly tsetse fly. I suspected, it is true, that they would not be proof against further attacks, still, I hoped that they would last for some time, as indeed proved to be the case

In the event of the beasts failing us, we took also ten of the best of those Strathmuir men who had accompanied us on the sea-cow trip, to serve as bearers when it became necessary. It cannot be said that these snuff-and-butter fellows—for most, if not all of them had some dash of white blood in their veins—were exactly willing volunteers. Indeed, if a choice had been left to them, they would, I think, have declined this adventure.

But there was no choice. Their master, Robertson, ordered them to come and after a glance at the Zulus they concluded that the command was one which would be enforced and that if they stopped behind, it would not be as living men. Also some of them had lost wives or children in the slaughter, which, if they were not very brave, filled them with a desire for revenge. Lastly they could all shoot after a fashion and had good rifles; moreover if I may say so, I think that they put confidence in my leadership. So they made the best of a bad business and got themselves ready.

Then arrangements must be made about the carrying on of the farm and store during our absence. These, together with my waggon and oxen, were put in the charge of Thomaso, since there was no one else who could be trusted at all—a very battered and crestfallen Thomaso, by the way. When he heard of it he was much relieved, since I think he feared lest he also should be expected to take part in the hunt of the Amahagger man-eaters. Also it may have occurred to him that in all probability none of us would ever come back at all, in which case by a process of natural devolution, he might find himself the owner of the business and much valuable property. However, he swore by sundry saints-for Thomaso was nominally a Catholic-that he would look after everything as though it were his own, as no doubt he hoped it might become.

'Hearken, fat pig,' said Umslopogaas, Hans obligingly ranslating so that there might be no mistake, 'if I come back, and come back I shall who travel with the Great Medicine-and find even one of the cattle of the white lord, Macumazahn, Watcher-by-Night, missing, or one article stolen rom his waggon, or the fields of your master not cultivated or his goods wasted, I swear by the Axe that I will hew you into pieces with the axe: yes, if to do it I have to hunt you from where the sun rises to where it sets and down the length of the night between. Do you understand, fat pig, deserter of women and children, who to save yourself could run faster. than a buck?'

Thomaso replied that he understood very clearly indeed, and that, Heaven helping him, all should be kept safe and sound. Still. I was sure that in his manly heart he was promising great gifts to the saints if they would so arrange matters that Umslopogaas and his axe were never seen at Strathmuir. again, and reflecting that after all the Amahagger had their uses. However, as I did not trust him in the least, much against their will. I left my driver and voorlooper to guard my belongings

At last we did get off, pursued by the fervent blessings of Thomaso and the prayers of the others that we would avenge their murdered relatives. We were a curious and motley procession. First went Hans, because at following a spoor he was, I believe, almost unequalled in Africa, and with him, Umslopogaas, and three of his Zulus to guard against surprise. These were followed by Captain Robertson, who seemed to prefer to walk alone and whom I thought it best to leave undisturbed Then I came and after me straggled the Strathmuir boys with the pack animals, the cavalcade being closed by the remaining Zulus under the command of Goroko. These walked last in case any of the mixed-bloods should attempt to desert, as we thought it quite probable that they would.

where I feared that our troubles might begin, since if the Amahagger were cunning, they would take advantage of it to confuse or hide their spoor. As it chanced, however, they had done nothing of the sort and a child could have followed their march. Just before nightfall we came to their first halting-place where they had made a fire and eaten one of the herd of farm goats which they had driven away with them, although they left the cattle, I suppose because goats are docile and travel well.

Hans showed us everything that had happened; where the chair in which Inez was carried was set down, where she and Janee had been allowed to walk that she might stretch her stiff limbs, the dregs of some coffee that evidently Janee had made in a saucepan, and so forth.

He even told us the exact number of the Amahagger, which he said totalled forty-one, including the man whom Inez had wounded. His spoor he distinguished from that of the others both by an occasional drop of blood and because he walked lightly on his right foot, doubtless for the reason that he wished to avoid jarring his wound, which was on that side.

At this spot we were obliged to stay till daybreak, since it was impossible to follow the spoor by night, a circumstance that gave the cannibals a great advantage over us.

The next two days were repetitions of the first, but on the fourth we passed out of the bush-veld into the swamp country that bordered the great river. Here our task was still easy since the Amahagger had followed one of the paths made by the river dwellers who had their habitations on mounds, though whether these were natural or artificial I am not sure, and sometimes on floating islands.

On our second day in the reeds we came upon a sad sight. To our left stood one of these mound villages, if a village it could be called, since it consisted only of four or five huts inhabited perhaps by twenty people. We went up to it to obtain information and stumbled across the body of an old man lying in the pathway. A few yards further on we found the ashes of a big fire and by it such remains as we had seen at Strathmuir. Here there had been another cannibal feast. The miserable huts were empty, but as at Strathmuir, had not been burnt.

We were going away when the acute ears of Hans caught the sound of groans. We searched about and in a clump of reeds near the foot of the mound, found an old woman with a great spear wound just above her skinny thigh piercing deep rees grew sparsely, which valleys were separated from each other by ridges of high and barren land. On these belts of ocky soil our difficulties were great, but here twice we were out on the right track by more fragments torn from the dress of Inez.

At length we lost the spoor altogether; not a sign of it was to be found. We had no idea which way to go. All about us appeared these valleys covered with scattered bush running this way and that, so that we could not tell which of them to follow or to cross. The thing seemed hopeless, for how could we expect to find a little body of men in that immensity? Hans shook his head and even the fierce and steadfast Robertson was discouraged.

'I fear my poor lassie is gone,' he said and relapsed into brooding as had become his wont.

'Never say die! It's dogged as does it!' I replied cheerfully in the words of Nelson, who also had learned what it meant to hunt an enemy over trackless wastes, although his were of water.

I walked to the top of the rise where we were encamped, and sat down alone to think matters over. Our condition was somewhat parlous; all our beasts were now dead, even the second donkey, which was the last of them, having perished that morning, and been eaten, for food was scanty since of late we had met with little game. The Strathmuir men, who now must carry the loads, were almost worn out and doubtless would have deserted, except for the fact that there was no place to which they could go. Even the Zulus were discouraged, and said they had come away from home across the Great River to fight, not to run about in wildernesses and starve, though Umslopogaas made no complaint, being buoyed up by the promise of his soothsayer, Goroko, that battle was ahead of him in which he would win great glory.

Hans, however, remained cheerful, for the reason, as he remarked vacuously, that the Great Medicine was with us and that therefore, however bad things seemed to be, all in fact was well; an argument that carried no conviction to my soul.

It was on a certain evening towards sunset that I went away thus alone I looked about me, east and west and north. Everywhere appeared the same bush-clad valleys and barren rises, miles upon miles of them I bethought me of the map that old Zikali had drawn in the ashes, and remembered that it showed these valleys and rises and that beyond them there should be a great swamp, and beyond the swamp a mountain.

So it seemed that we were on the right road to the home of his white Queen, if such a person existed, or at any rate we were passing over country similar to that which he had pictured or imagined.

But at this time I was not troubling my head about white queens. I was thinking of poor Inez. That she was alive a few days before we knew from the fragments of her dress. But where was she now? The spoor was utterly lost on that stony ground, or if any traces of it remained a heavy deluge of rain had washed them away. Even Hans had confessed himself beaten.

I stared about me helplessly, and as I did so a flying ray of light from the setting sun reflected downwards from a storm-cloud, fell upon a white patch on the crest of one of the distant land-waves. It struck me that probably limestone outcropped at this spot, as indeed proved to be the case; also that such a patch of white would be a convenient guide for any who were travelling across that sea of bush. Further, some instinct within seemed to impel me to steer for it, although I had all but made up my mind to go in a totally different direction many points more to the east. It was almost as though a voice were calling to me to take this path and no other. Doubtless this was an effect produced by weariness and mental overstrain. Still, there it was very real and tangible, one that I did not attempt to combat.

So next morning at the dawn I headed north by west, laying my course for that white patch and for the first time breaking the straight line of our advance. Captain Robertson, whose temper had not been bettered by prolonged and frightful anxiety, or I may add, by his unaccustomed total abstinence, asked me rather roughly why I was altering the course.

'Look here, Captain,' I answered, 'if we were at sea and you did something of the sort. I should not put such a question to you, and if by any chance I did. I should not expect you to answer. Well, by your own wish I am in command here and I think that the same argument holds.'

'Yes,' he replied. 'I suppose you have studied your chart, if there is any of this God-forsaken country, and at a rate discipline is discipline. So steam ahead and don't me.'

The others accepted my decision without comments them were so miserable that they did not car

'Doubtless the Baas has reasons,' said Hans dubiously, 'although the spoor, when last we saw it, headed towards the rising sun and as the country is all the same, I do not see why those man-eaters should have returned.

'Yes.' I said, 'I have reasons,' although in fact I had none at all.

Hans surveyed me with a watery eye as though waiting for me to explain them, but I looked haughty and declined to oblige.

'The Baas has reasons,' continued Hans, 'for taking us on . what I think to be the wrong side of that great ridge, there tohunt for the spoor of the men-caters, and they are so deep down in his mind that he cannot dig them up for poor old Hans to look at. Well, the Baas wears the Great Medicine and perhaps it is there that the reasons sit. Those Strathmuir fellows say that they can go no further and wish to die. Umslonogaas has just gone to them with his axe to tell them that he is ready to help them to their wish Look, he has got there, for they are coming quickly, who after all prefer to live."

Well, we started for my white patch of stones which no one else had noticed and of which I said nothing to anyone, and reached it by the following evening, to find, as I expected, that

Be now we were in a poor way, for we had practically nothing left to eat, which did not tend to raise the spirits of the party. Also that lime outerop proved to be an uninteresting spot overlooking a wide valley which seemed to suggest that there were other valleys of a similar sort beyond it, and nothing more.

Captun Robertson sat stern-faced and despondent at a distance muttering into his beard, as had become a habit with him. Emslopogaus leaned upon his are and contemplated the heavens, also occasionally the Strathmuir men who cowered beneath his eye. The Zulus squatted about sharing such snuff as remained to them in economic pinches. Goroko, the witch-doctor, engaged himself in consulting his 'Spirit,' by means of bone-throwing, upon the humble subject of whether or no we should succeed in killing any game for food . tomorrow, a point on which I gathered that his 'Spirit' was quite uncertain. In short, the gloom was deep and universal and the sky looked as though it were going to rain.

Hans became sarcastic Sneaking up to me in his most aggravating way, like a dog that means to steal comething and cover up the theft with simulated affection, he pointed out one by one all the disadvantages of our present position. He indicated per contra, that if his advice had been followed, his conviction was that even if we had not found the maneaters and rescued the lady called Sad-Eyes, our state would have been quite different. He was sure, he added, that the valley which he had suggested we should follow, was one full of game, inasmuch as he had seen their spoor at its entrance, 'Then why did you not say so?' I asked.

'Then why did you not say so?' I asked. Hans sucked at his empty corn-cob pipe, which was his way of indicating that he would like me to give him some tobacco, much as a dog groans heavily under the table when he wants a bit to eat, and answered that it was not for him to point out things to one who knew everything, like the great Macumazahn, Watcher-by-Night, his honoured master, Still, the luck did seem to have gone a bit wrong. The privations could have been put up with there he sucked very loudly at the empty pipe and looked at mine, which was alight), everything could have been put up with, if only there had been a chance of coming even with those men-eaters and receing the Lady Sad-Eves, whose face haunted his sleep. As it was, however, he was convinced that by following the course I had mapped out we had lost their spoor finally and that probably y were now three days' march away in another direction. Il, the Baas had said that he had his reasons, and that of arse was enough for him, Hans, only if the Bans would indescend to tell him, he would as a matter of curiosity like know what the reasons were.

At that moment I confess that, much as I was attached to m, I should have liked to murder Hans, who, I felt, believed.

m, I should have liked to murder Hans, who, I felt, believe at the had me 'on toast,' to use a vulgar phrase, was the or dvantage of my position to make a mock of me in the 'y, lottenter way.

which they have not done for a long time. Perhaps you would like to know why this has happened. If so I will tell you. It is because for some days past I have purposely lost their spoor, which they knew we were following, and lit fires to puzzle them. Now, thinking that they had done with us, they have become incautious and shown us where they are. That is my reason, Hans.'

He heard and, although of course, he did not believe that I had lost the spoor on purpose, stared at me till I thought his little eyes were going to drop out of his head. But even in his admiration he contrived to convey an insult as only a native can.

'How wonderful is the Great Medicine of the Opener-of-Roads, that it should have been able thus to instruct the Baas, he said. 'Without doubt the Great Medicine is right and yonder those men-eaters are encamped, who might just as well have been anywhere else within a hundred miles.'

'Drat the Great Medicine,' I replied, but beneath my breath, then added aloud,

'Be so good, Hans, as to go to Umslopogaas and to tell him that Macumazahn, or the Great Medicine, proposes to march at once to attack the camp of the Amahagger, andhere is some tobacco.'

'Yes, Baas,' answered Hans humbly, as he snatched the tobacco and wriggled away like a worm.

Then I went to talk with Robertson.

The end of it was that within an hour we were creeping across that valley towards the spot where I had seen the line of smoke rising against the twilight sky.

Somewhere about midnight we reached the neighbourhood of this place. How near or how far we were from it, we could not tell since the moon was invisible, as of course the smoke was in the dark. Now the question was, what should we do?

Obviously there would be enormous advantages in a night attack, or at least in locating the enemy, so that it might be carried out at dawn before he marched. Especially was this so, since we were scarcely in condition even if we could come face to face with them, to fight these savages when they were prepared and in the light of day. Only we two white men, with Hans, Umslopogaas and his Zulus, could be relied upon in such a case, since the Strathmuir mixed-bloods had become entirely demoralised and were not to be trusted at a pinch. Indeed, tired and half starving as we were, none of us was at his best. Therefore a surprise seemed our only chance. But first we must find those whom we wished to surprise, Ultimately, after a hurried consultation, it was agreed that Hans and I should go forward and see if we could locate the Amahagger. Robertson wished to come too, but I pointed out that he must remain to look after his people, who, if he left them, might take the opportunity to melt away in the darkness, especially as they knew that heavy fighting was at hand. Also if anything happened to me it was desirable that one white man should remain to lead the party. Umslopogaas, too, volunteered, but knowing his character. I declined his help. To tell the truth, I was almost certain that if we came upon the men-eaters, he would charge the whole lot of them and accomplish a fine but futile end after hacking down a number of cannibal barbarians, whose extinction or escape remained absolutely immaterial to our purpose, namely, the rescue of Inez.

So it came about that Hans and I started alone, I not at all enjoying the job. I suppose that there lurks in my nature some of that primeval terror of the dark, which must continually have haunted our remote forefathers of a hundred or a thousand generations gone and still lingers in the blood of most of us. At any rate even if I am named the Watcher-by-Night, greatly do I prefer to fight or to face peril in the sunlight, though it is true that I would rather avoid both at any time.

In fact, I wished heartily that the Amahagger were at the other side of Africa, or in heaven, and that I, completely ignorant of the person called Inez Robertson, were scated smoking the pipe of peace on my own stoep in Durban. I think that Hans guessed my state of mind, since he suggested that he should go alone, adding with his usual veiled rudeness, that he was quite certain that he would do much better without me, since white men always made a noise.

'Yes,' I replied, determined to give him a Roland for his Oliver, 'I have no doubt you would—under the first bush you came across, where you would sleep till dawn, and then return and say that you could not find the Amahagger.'

Hans chuckled, quite appreciating the joke, and having their mutually affronted each other, we started on our quest.

THE SWAMP

NEITHER Hans nor I carried rifles that we knew would be if the way on our business, which was just to scout. Moreover one is always tempted to shoot if a gun is at hand, and this I did not want to do at present. So, although I had my revolve in case of urgent necessity, my only other weapon was a Zulaxe, that formerly had belonged to one of those two men when died defending Inez on the veranda at Strathmuir, while Har had nothing but his long knife. Thus armed, or unarmed we crept forward towards that spot whence, as we conjectured we had seen the line of smoke rising some hours before.

For about a quarter of a mile we went on thus withouseeing or hearing anything, and a difficult job it was in the gloom among the scattered trees with no light save such a the stars gave us. Indeed, I was about to suggest that we have better abandon the enterprise until daybreak when Hainudged me, whispering.

'Look to the right between those twin thorns.'

I obeyed and following the line of sight which he had is dicated, perceived, at a distance of about two hundred yars a faint glow, so faint indeed that I think only Hans wou have noticed it. Really it might have been nothing more that the phosphorescence rising from a heap of fungus, or every from a decaying animal.

'The fire of which we saw the smoke that has burnt ashes,' whispered Hans again. 'I think that they have gone, b let us look.'

So we crawled forward very cautiously to avoid making t slightest noise; so cautiously, indeed, that it must have tak us nearly half an hour to cover those two hundred yards.

At length we were within about forty yards of that dyi fire and, afraid to go further, came to a stand—or rather, lie-still—behind some bushes until we knew more. Hans lift his head and snifted with his broad nostrils; then he whisper into my ear, but so low that I could scarcely hear him,

'Amahagger there all right, Baas, I smell them.'

This of course was possible, since what wind there w blew from the direction of the fire, although I whose nose is fairly keen, could smell nothing at all. So I determined to wait and watch a while, and indicated my decision to Hans, who, considering our purpose accomplished, showed signs of wishing to retreat.

Some minutes we lay thus, till of a sudden this happened. A branch of resinous wood of which the stem had been eaten through by the flames, fell upon the ashes of the fire and burnt up with a brilliant light. In it we saw the Amahagger sleeping in a circle round the fire wrapped in their blankets.

Also we saw another thing, namely that nearer to us, not more than a dozen yards away, indeed, was a kind of little tent, also made of fur rugs or blankets, which doubtless sheltered Inez. Indeed, this was evident from the fact that at the mouth of it, wrapped up in something, lay none other than her maid, Janee, for her face being towards us, was recognised by us both in the flare of the flaming branch. One more thing we noted, namely, that two of the cannibals, evidently a guard, were sleeping between us and the little tent. Of course they ought to have been awake, but fatigue had overcome them and there they slumbered, seated on the ground, their heads hanging forward almost upon their knees.

An idea came to me. If we could kill those men without waking the others in that gloom, it might be possible to rescue Inez at once. Rapidly I weighed the pros and cons of such an attempt. Its advantages, if successful, were that the object of our pursuit would be carried through without further trouble and that it was most doubtful whether we should ever get such a chance again. If we returned to fetch the others and attacked in force, the probability was that those Amahagger, or one of them, would hear some sound made by the advance of a number of men, and fly into the darkness; or, rather than lose Inez, they might kill her Or if they stood and fought, she might be slain in the scrimmage. Or, as after all we had only about a dozen effectives, for the Strathmuir bearers could not be relied upon, they might wo or thre

These were the arguments for the atten making it were equally obvious. To begin extraordinary risk: the two guards or sot them might wake up—for such people, like with one eye open, especially when they k being pursued. Or if they did not we migh ness so that they raised an outery before t ever, in which case both of us and perhaps Inez also would probably pay the penalty before we could get away.

Such was the horned dilemma upon one point or other of which we ran the risk of being impaled. For a full minute or more I considered the matter with an earnestness almost amounting to mental agony, and at last all but came to the conclusion that the danger was too enormous. It would be better, notwithstanding the many disadvantages of that plan, to go back and fetch the others.

But then it was that I made one of my many mistakes in life. Most of us do more foolish things than wise ones and sometimes I think that in spite of a certain reputation for caution and far-sightedness, I am exceptionally cursed in this respect. Indeed, when I look back upon my past, I can scarcely see the scanty flowers of wisdom that decorate its nath because of the fat, ugly trees of error by which it is overshadowed.

On that occasion, forgetting past experiences where Hans, was concerned, my natural tendency to blunder took the form of relying upon mother's judgment instead of on my own. Although I had formed a certain view as to what should be done, the prise and core seemed so evenly balanced that I determined to consult the little Hottentot and accept his verdict. This, after all, was but a form of gambling like patch and toss, since, although it is true Hans was a clever, or it my rate a cunning man according to his lights, and experienced, it meant that I was placing my own judgment in about the process which no one considering a life-and-death enterprise should do, taking the chance of that of another, whatever it might be However, not for the first time, I did so—to my grief.

In the timest of whispers with my lips right against his smelly head. I submitted the problem to Hans, asking him what we should do, go on or go back. He considered a while; then answered in a voice which he contrived to make like the

drone of a night beerle

Those men are fast asleep, I know it by their breathing. Also the Bass has the Great Medicine Therefore I say go on, kill them and rescue Sad-Eyes.

Now I saw that the Fates to which I had appealed had decided against me and that I must accept their decree. With a sick and sinking heart—for I did not at all like the business—I wondered for a moment what had led Hans to take this view, which was directly opposite to any I had expected from him. Of course his superstrion about the Great Medicine had something to do with it, but I felt convinced this was not all.

Even then I guessed that two arguments appeared to him, of which the first was that he desired, if possible, to put an end to this intolerable and unceasing hunt which had worn or all out, no matter what that end might be. The second and more powerful, however, was, I believed, and rightly, that the idea of this stealthy, midnight blow appealed irresistibly to the craft of his half-wild nature in which the trains of the leopard and the snake seemed to mingle with that of the human being. For be it remembered that notwirk tanding his veneer of civilisation, Hans was a savage whose ferefather, for countless ages had preserved themselves alive by means of such attacks and stratagems.

we made our arrangements, which were few and simple They ounted to this—that we were to creep on to the man and the of us to kill that one who was opposite to him. I will axe and Hans with his knife, remembering that it must done with a single stroke—that is, if they did not wake and kill us—after which we were to get Inez out of her shelter, essed or undressed, and make off with her into the darkness areached our own camp.

Provided that we could kill the two guards in the proper shion—rather a large proviso, I admit—the thing was simple; shelling peas which, notwithstanding the proverb, in my sperience is not simple at all, since generally the shells crack he wrong way and at least one of the peas remains in the ced. So it happened in this case, for Janee, whom we had win forgotten, remained in the pod.

I am sure I don't know why we overlooked her: indeed the error was inexcusable, especially as Hans had already experienced her foolishness and she was lying there defere ear eyes. I suppose that our minds were so concentrated upon the grard-killing and the tragic and impressive Inex that there was no room in them for the stolid and matter-of-fact Inexe. At any rate she proved to be the pea that would not come out of the pod.

Often in my life I have felt terrified, no of those who rejoices in dangers and will own sake, which only the stupid do, but trary, been forced to undertake them be cumtances, a kind of hydraulic force t and who, having undertaken, has been triumphing over the shrinkings of his flesh by some secret reserve of nerve power. Almost am I tempted to call it spiritpower, something that lives beyond and yet inspires our frail and fallible bodies.

Well, rarely have I been more frightened than I was at this moment. Actually I hung back until I saw that Hans slithering through the grass like a thick yellow snake with the great knife in his right hand, was quite a foot ahead of me. Then my pride came to the rescue and I spurted, if one can spurt upon one's stomach, and drew level with him. After this we went at a pace so slow that any able-bodied snail would have left us standing still. Inch by inch we crept forward, lying motionless. a while after each convulsive movement, once for quite a long time, since the left-hand cannibal seemed about to wake up, for he opened his mouth and yawned. If so, he changed his mind and rolling from a sitting posture on to his side, went to sleep much more soundly than before.

A minute or so later the right-hand ruffian, my man, alsostirred, so sharply that I thought he had heard something, Apparently, however, he was only haunted by dreams resulting from an evil life, or perhaps by a prescience of its end, for after waving his arm and muttering something in a frightened voice, he too, wearied out, poor devil, sank back into sleep.

At last we were on them, but paused because we could not see exactly where to strike and knew, each of us, that our first blow must be the last and fatal. A cloud had come up and dimmed what light there was, and we must wait for it to pass. It was a long wait, or so it seemed.

At length that cloud did pass and in faint outline I saw the classical head of my Amahagger bowed in deep sleep. With a heart beating as it does only in the fierce extremities of love or war, I hissed like a snake, which was our agreed signal. Then rising to my knees, I lifted the Zulu axe and struck with all my strength.

The blow was straight and true; Umslopogaas himself could not have dealt a better. The victim in front of me uttered no sound and made no movement; only sank gently on to his side, and there lay as dead as though he had never been born.

It appeared that Hans had done equally well, since the other man kicked out his long legs, which struck me on the knees. Then he also became strangely still. In short, both of them were stone dead and would tell no stories this side of Judgment Day.

Recovering my axe, which had been wrenched from my hand, I crept forward and opened the curtain-like rugs or blankets, I do not know which they were, that covered Inez. I heard her stir at once. The movement had wakened her, since captives sleep lightly.

'Make no noise, Inez,' I whispered. 'It is I, Allan Quatermain, come to rescue you. Slip out and follow me: do you understand?'

'Yes, quite,' she whispered back and began to rise.

At this moment a blood-curdling yell seemed to fill earth and heaven, a yell at the memory of which even now I feel faint, although I am writing years after its echoes died away.

I may as well say at once that it came from Janee who, awaking suddenly, had perceived against the background of the sky. Hans standing over her, looking like a yellow devil with a long knife in his hand, which she thought was about to be used to murder her.

So, lacking self-restraint, she screamed in the most lusty fashion, for her lungs were excellent, and—the game was up.

Instantly every man sleeping round the fire leapt to his feet and rushed in the direction of the echoes of Jance's yell. It was impossible to get Inez free of her tent arrangement or to do anything, except whisper to her,

'Feign sleep and know nothing. We will follow you. Your father is with us.'

Then I bolted back into the bushes, which Hans had reached already.

A minute or two later when we were clear of the hubbub and nearing our own camp, Hans remarked to me sententiously,

'The Great Medicine worked well, Baas, but not quite well enough, for what medicine can avail against a woman's folly?'

'It was our own folly we should blame,' I answered. 'We ought to have known that fool-girl would shrick, and taken precautions.'

'Yes, Baas, we ought to have killed her too, for nothing else would have kept her quiet,' replied Hans in cheerful assent. 'Now we shall have to pay for our mistake, for the hunt must go on.'

At this moment we stumbled across Robertson and Umslopogaas who, with the others and every living thing within a mile or two had also heard Janee's yell, and briefly told our story. When he learned how near we had been

daughter, Robertson groaned, but Umslopogaas only said,

Well, there are two less of the men-eaters left to deal with.

Still, for once your wisdom failed you, Macumazahn. When you had found the camp you should have returned, so that we might all attack it together. Had we done so, before the dawn there would not have been one of them left.

'Yes,' I answered, 'I think that my wisdom did fail me, if I have any to fail. But come; perhaps we may eatch them yet.'

So we advanced, Hans and I showing the road. But when we reached the place it was too late, for all that remained of the Amahagger, or of Inez and Janee, were the two dead men whom we had killed, and in that darkness pursuit was impossible. So we went back to our own camp to rest and await the dawn before taking up the trail, only to find ourselves confronted with a new trouble. All the Strathmuir half-breeds whom we had left behind as useless, had taken advantage of our absence and that of the Zulus, to desert. They had just bolted back upon our tracks and vanished into the sea of bush. What became of them I do not know, as we never saw them again, but my belief is that these cowardly fellows all perished, for not one of them reached Strathmuir.

Fortunately for us, however, they departed in such a hurrythat they left all their loads behind them, and even some of the guns they carried Evidently Janee's yell was the last straw which broke the back of such nerve as remained to them Doubtless they believed it to be the signal of attack by hordes of cannibals.

As there was nothing to be said or done, since any pursuit of these curs was out of the question, we made the best of things as they were. It proved a simple business. From the loads we selected such articles as were essential, ammunition for the most part, to carry ourselves—and the rest we abandoned, hiding it under a pile of stones in case we should ever come that way again.

The guns they had thrown aside we distributed among the Zulus who had none, though the thought that they possessed them, so far as I was concerned, added another terror to life. The prospect of going into battle with those wild axemen letting off bullets in every direction was not pleasant, but fortunately when that crisis came they east them away and reverted to the weapons to which they were accustomed.

Now all this sounds much like a tale of disaster, or at any rate of failure. It is, however, wonderful by what strange ways good results are brought about, so much so that at times I think that these seeming accidents must be arranged by an Intelligence superior to our own, to fulfil through us purposes of which we know nothing, and frequently, be it admitted, of a nature sufficiently obscure. Of course this is a fatalistic doctrine, but then, as I have said before, within certain limits I am a fatalist.

To take the present case, for instance, the whole Inez episode at first sight might appear to be an excrescence on my narrative, of which the object is to describe how I met a certain very wonderful woman and what I heard and experienced in her company. Yet it is not really so, since had it not been for the Inez adventure, it is quite clear that I should never have reached the home of this woman, if woman she were, or have seen her at all. Before long this became very obvious to me, as shall be told.

From the night upon which Hans and I failed to rescue Inez we had no more difficulty in following the trail of the cannibals who thenceforward were never more than a few hours ahead of us and had no time to be careful or to attempt to hide their spoor. Yet so fast did they travel that do what we would, burdened and wearied as we were, it proved impossible to overtake them.

For the first three days the track ran on through scattered, rolling bush-veld of the character that I have described, but tending continually down hill. When we broke camp on the morning of the fourth day, eating a hasty meal at dawn (for now game had become astonishingly plentiful, so that we did not lack food) the rising sun showed beneath us an endless sea of billowy mist stretching in every direction far as the sight could carry.

To the north, however, it did come to an end, for there, as I judged fifty or sixty miles away, rose the grim outline of what looked like a huge fortress, which I knew must be one of those extraordinary mountain formations, probably owing their origin to volcanic action, that are to be met with here and there in the vast expanses of Central and Eastern Africa. Being so distant it was impossible to estimate its size, which I guessed must be enormous, but in looking at it I bethought me of that great mountain in which Zikali said the marvellous white Queen lived, and wondered whether it could be the same, as from my memory of his map upon the ashes, it well might be, that is, if such a place existed at all. If so the map had shown it as surrounded by swamps and—well, surely that mist hid the face of a mighty swamp?

It did indeed, since before nightfall, following the of those Amahagger, we had plunged into a morass so that in all my experience I have never seen or heard of like. It was a veritable ocean of papyrus and other r some of them a dozen or more feet high, so that it was possible to see a yard in any direction.

Here it was that the Amahagger ahead of us proved salvation, since without them to guide us we must soon perished. For through that gigantic swamp there ran a r as I think an ancient road, since in one or two places I stone work which must have been laid by man. Yet it not a road which it would have been possible to follow with a guide, seeing that it also was overgrown with reeds. Ind the only difference between it and the surrounding swamp that on the road the soil was comparatively firm, that i say, one seldom sank into it above the knee, whereas on ei say, one selection side of it the quagmires were often apparently bottomless, what is more, partook of the nature of quicksand.

This we found out soon after we entered the swamp, si Robertson, pushing forward with the sierce eagerness wh seemed to consume him, neglected to keep his eye upon spoor and stepped off the edge on to land that appeared to exactly similar to its surface. Instantly he began to sink greasy and tenacious mud. Umslopogaas and I were of twenty yards behind, yet by the time we reached him answer to his shouts, already he was engulfed up to his mide and going down so rapidly that in another minute he wou have vanished altogether. Well, we got him out but not wi ease, for that mud clung to him like the tentacles of octopus. After this we were more careful.

Nor did this road run straight; on the contrary, it curve about and sometimes turned at right angles, doubtless avoid a piece of swamp over which it had proved impossib for the ancients to construct a causeway, or to follow son

The difficulties of that horrible place are beyond descrip tion, and indeed can scarcely be imagined. First there wa that of a kind of grass which grew among the roots of th reeds and had edges like to those of knives. As Robertson and I wore gaiters we did not suffer so much from it, but the poor Zulus with their bare legs were terribly cut about and

Then there were the mosquitoes which lived here by the million and all seemed anxious for a bite; also snakes of peculiarly deadly kind were numerous. A Zulu was bitten by one of them of so poisonous a nature that he died within three minutes, for the venom seemed to go straight to his heart. We threw his body into the swamp, where it vanished at once.

Lastly there were the all-pervading stench and the intolerable heat of the place, since no breath of air could penetrate that forest of reeds, while a minor trouble was that of the multitude of leeches which fastened on to our bodies. By looking one could see the creatures sitting on the under side of leaves with their heads stretched out waiting to attack anything that went by. As wayfarers there could not have been numerous, I wondered what they had lived on for the past few thousand years. By the way, I found that paraffin, of which we had a small supply for our hand-lamps, rubbed over all exposed surfaces, was to some extent a protection against these blood-sucking worms and the gnats, although it did make one go about smelling like a dirty oil tin.

During the day, except for the occasional rush of some great iguana or other reptile, and the sound of the wings of the flocks of wildfowl passing over us from time to time, the march was deathly silent. But at night it was different, for then the bull-frogs boomed incessantly, as did the bitterns, while great swamp owls and other night-flying birds uttered their weird cries. Also there were mysterious sucking noises caused, no doubt, by the sinking of areas of swamp, with those of bursting bubbles of foul, up-rushing gas.

Strange lights, too, played about, will-o'-the-wisps or St. Elmo fires, as I believe they are called, that frightened the Zulus very much, since they believed them to be spirits of the dead. Perhaps this superstition had something to do with their native legend that mankind was 'torn out of the reeds.' If so, they may have imagined that the ghosts of men went back to the reeds. of which there were enough to accommodate those of the entire Zulu nation. Any way they were much scared; even the bold witch-doctor, Goroko, was scared and went through incantations with the little bag of medicines he carried to secure protection for himself and his companions. Indeed, I think even the iron Umslopogaas himself was not as comfortable as he might have been, although he did inform me that he had come out to fight and did not care whether it were with man, or wizard, or spirit.

In short, of all the journeys that I have made, with the exception of the passage of the desert on our way to King Solomon's Mines, I think that through this enormous swamp was the most miserable. Heartily did I curse myself for ever having undertaken such a quest in a wild attempt to allay that sickness, or rather to quench that thirst of the soul which, I imagine, at times assails most of those who have hearts and think or dream.

For this was at the bottom of the business: this it was which had delivered me into the hands of Zikali, Opener-of-Roads, who, as now I felt sure, was merely making use of me for his private occult purposes. He desired to consult the distant Oracle, if such a person existed, as to great schemes of his own, and therefore, to attain his end, made use of my secret longings which I had been so foolish as to reveal to him, pute careless of what happened to me in the process.

Well, I was in for the business and must follow it to the finish whatever that might be. After all it was very interesting and if there were anything in what Zikali said (if there were not I could not perceive what object he had in sending me on such a wild goose-chase through this home of geese and ducks), it might become more interesting still. For being pretty well fever-proof I did not think I should die in that morass, as of course nine white men out of ten would have done, and, beyond it lay the huge mountain which day by day grew larger and clearer.

Nor did Hans, who, with a childlike trust, pinned his faith to the Great Medicine. This, he remarked, was the worst veld through which he had ever travelled, but as the Great Medicine would never consent to be buried in that stinking mud, he had no doubt that we should come safely through it some time. I replied that this wonderful medicine of his had not saved one of our companions who had now made a grave in the same mud.

'No. Baas,' he said, 'but those Zulus have nothing to do with the Medicine which was given to you, and to me who accompanied you when we saw the Opener-of-Roads. Therefore perhaps they will all die, except Umslopogaas, whom you were told to take with you. If so, what does it matter, since there are plenty of Zulus, although there be but one Macumazahn or one Hans? Also the Baas may remember that he began by offending a snake and therefore it is quite natural that this snake's brother should have bitten the Zulu.'

'If you are right, he should have bitten me. Hans,'

'Yes, Baas, and so no doubt he would have done had you not been protected by the Great Medicine, and me too had not my grandfather been a snake-charmer, to say nothing of the smell of the Medicine being on me as well. The snakes know those that they should bite, Baas.

'So do the mosquitoes.' I answered, grabbing a handful of them. 'The Great Medicine has no effect upon them.'

'Oh! yes, Bass, it has, since though it pleases them to bite, the bites do us no harm, or at least not much, and all are made happy. Still, I wish we could get out of these reeds of which I never want to see another, and Baas, please keep your rifle ready for I think I hear a crocodile stirring there.'

'No need, Hans,' I remarked sarcastically, 'Go and tell him that I have the Great Medicine.'

'Yes, Baas, I will; also that if he is very hungry, there are some Zulus camped a few yards further down the road,' and he went solemnly to the reeds a little way off and hegan to talk into them.

'You infernal donkey!' I murmured, and drew my blanket over my head in a vain attempt to keep out the mosquitoes and smoking furiously with the same object, tried to get to sleep.

At last the swamp bottom began to slope upwards a little, with the result that as the land dried through natural drainage, the reeds grew thinner by degrees, until finally they ceased and we found ourselves on firmer ground; indeed, upon the lowest slopes of the great mountain that I have mentioned, that now towered above us, forbidding and majestic.

I had made a little map in my pocket-book of the various twists and turns of the road through that vast Slough of Despond, marking them from hour to hour as we followed its devious wanderings. On studying this at the end of that part of our journey I realised afresh how utterly impossible it would have been for us to thread that misty maze where a few false steps would always have meant death by suffocation, had it not been for the spoor of those Amahagger travelling immediately ahead of us who were acquainted with its secret. Had they been friendly guides they could not have done in a better turn.

What I wondered was why they had not tried to ambout us in the reeds, since our fires must have shown them the server close upon their heels. That they did try to here was clear from certain evidences that I found, but form at this season of the year in the absence of a street tank weeds were too green to catch fire. For the test soon to learn the reason of their neglect to attack dense cover. They were waiting for a better so

THE ATTACK

/E won out of the reeds at last, for which I fervently thanked lod, since to have crossed that endless marsh unguided, with le loss of only one man, seemed little less than miraculous /e emerged from them late in the afternoon and being rearied out, stopped for a while to rest and eat of the flest f a buck that I had been fortunate enough to shoot upor neir fringe. Then we pushed forward up the slope, proposing a camp for the night on the crest of it a mile or so away where I thought we should escape from the deadly mist it which we had been enveloped for so long, and obtain a cleaniew of the country ahead.

Following the bank of a stream which here ran down into he marsh, we came at length to this crest just as the sun was inking. Below us lay a deep valley, a fold, as it were, in this kin of the mountain, well but not densely bushed. The wood of this valley climbed up the mountain flank for some distance above it and then gave way to grassy slopes that ender in steep sides of rock, which were crowned by a black and frowning precipice of unknown height.

There was, I remember, something very impressive about this towering natural wall, which seemed to shut off whateve lay beyond from the gaze of man, as though it veiled at ancient mystery. Indeed, the aspect of it thrilled me, I knew not why. I observed, however, that at one point in the mighty cliff there seemed to be a narrow cleft down which, no doubt lava had flowed in a remote age, and it occurred to me that up this cleft ran a roadway, probably a continuation of that by which we had threaded the swamp. The fact that through my glasses I could see herds of cattle grazing on the slope of the mountains went to confirm this view, since cattle imply owners and herdsmen, and search as I would, I could find no native villages on the slopes. The inference seemed to be that those owners dwelt beyond or within the mountain the light of the setting sun.

Meanwhile Umslopogaas had been engaged in externing the spot where we were to camp for the night. Some soldierly instinct, or perchance some prescience of danger, enused him to choose a place particularly suitable to defence. It was on a steep-sided mound that more or less resembled a giganthe and heap. Upon one side this mound was protected by the attenual which because of a pool was here rather deep, while at the back of it stood a collection of those curious and plled-up water-worn rocks that are often to be found in Africa. These rocks, lying one upon another like the stones of a Cyclopean wall, curved round the western side of the mound, so that practically it was only open for a narrow space, say thirty or forty feet, upon that face of it which looked on to the mountain.

'Umslopogaas expects battle,' remarked Hans to me with a grin, otherwise with all this nice plain round us he would not have chosen to camp in a place which a few men could hold against many. Yes, Baas, he thinks that those cannibals are going to attack us.'

'Stranger things have happened,' I answered indifferently, and having seen to the rifles, went to lie down, observing as I did so that the tired Zulus seemed already to be asleep. Only Umslopogaas did not sleep. On the contrary, he stood leaning on his axe staring at the dim outlines of the opposing precipice.

'A strange mountain, Macumazahn,' he said, 'compared to it that of the Witch, beneath which my kraal lies, is but a little baby. I wonder what we shall find within it. I have always loved mountains, Macumazahn, ever since a dead brother of mine and I lived with the wolves in the Witch's lap, for on them I have had the best of my fighting.'

'Perhaps it is not done with yet,' I answered wearily.

'I hope not. Macumazahn, since some is due to us after all these days of mud and stench. Sleep a while now, Macumazahn, for that head of yours which you use so much, must need rest. Fear not, I and the little yellow man who do not think as much as you do, will keep watch and wake you if there is need, as mayhap there will be before dawn. Here none can come at us except in front, and the place is narrow.'

So I lay down and slept as soundly as ever I had done in my life, for a space of four or five hours I suppose. Then, by some instinct perhaps, I awoke suddenly, feeling much refreshed in that sweet mountain air, a new man indeed, and in the moonlight saw Umslopogaas striding towards me.

'Arise, Macumazahn,' he said. I hear men stirring below

At this moment Hans slipped past him, whispering,

The cannibals are coming, Baas, a good number of them.

Then he passed behind me to warn the Zulus. As he went by, I said to him,

If so, Hans, now is the time for your Great Medicine to show what it can do.'

'The Great Medicine will look after you and me all right, Baas,' he replied, pausing and speaking in Dutch, which Unslopogaas did not understand, 'but I expect there will be fewer of those Zulus to cook for before the sun grows hot. Their spirits will be turned into snakes and go back into the reeds from which they say they were "torn out," he added over his shoulder.

I should explain that Hans acted as cook to our party and t was a grievance with him that the Zulus ate so much of the neat which he was called upon to prepare. Indeed, there is sever much sympathy between Hottentots and Zulus.

'What is the little yellow man saying about us?' asked

Imslopogaas suspiciously.

He is saying that it it comes to battle, you and your men ill make a great fight, I replied diplomatically.

'Yes, we will do that, Macumazahn, but I thought he said, rat we should be killed and that this pleased him."

'Oh dear no!' I answered hastily. 'How could he be pleased that happened, since then he would be left defenceless, if he ere not killed too. Now, Umslopogaas, let us make a plan r this fight'

So, together with Robertson, rapidly we discussed the thing, a result, with the help of the Zulus, we dragged together ne loose stones and the tops of three small thorn trees ich we had cut down, and with them made a low breastrk, sufficient to give us some protection if we lay down shoot. It was the work of a few minutes since we had pared the material when we camped in case an emergency uld arise.

ehind this breastwork we gathered and waited, Robertson I being careful to get a little to the rear of the Zulus, who ill be remembered had the rifles which the Strathmuir ards had left behind them when they bolted, in addition teir axes and throwing assegais. The question was how cannibals would fight. I knew that they were armed with long spears and knives but I did not know if they used those spears for thrusting or for throwing. In the former case it would be difficult to get at them with the axes because they must have the longer reach. Fortunately as it turned cut, they did both.

At length all was ready and there came that long and trying wait, the most disagreeable part of a fight in which one grows nervous and begins to reflect earnestly upon one's sing. Clearly the Amahagger, if they really intended business, did not mean to attack till just before dawn, after the common native fashion, thinking to rush us in the low and puzzling light. What perplexed me was that they should wish to attack us at all after having let so many opportunities of doing so go by. Apparently these men were now in sight of their own home, where no doubt they had many friends, and by pushing on could reach its shelter before us, especially as they knew the roads and we did not.

They had come out for a secret purpose that seemed to have to do with the abduction of a certain young white woman for reasons connected with their tribal statecraft or rifical, which is the kind of thing that happens not infrequently among obscure and ancient African tribes. Well, they had abducted their young woman and were in sight of safety and someon in their objects, whatever these might be. For what powifile reason, then, could they desire to risk a fight with the outraged friends and relatives of that young woman?

It was true that they outnumbered us and therefore find a good chance of victory, but on the other hand, they must know that it would be very dearly won, and if it were not won, that we should retake their captive, so that all their trouble would have been for nothing. Further they must be as exhausted and travel-worn as we were ourselver and in no condition to face a desperate battle.

The problem was beyond me and I gave it up with the reflection that either this threatened attack was a mere feint to delay us, or that behind it was something mysterious, such as a determination to prevent us at all hazards from discovering the secrets of that mountain stronghold.

When I put the riddle to Hans, who was lying next to me, he was ready with another solution.

They are men-eaters, Baas, he said, 'and being hungry, wish to eat us before they get to their own land where doubtless they are not allowed to eat each other.'

'Do you think so,' I answered, 'when we are so thin?' an I surveyed Hans' scraggy form in the moonlight.

Oh! yes, Baas, we should be quite good boiled—like of hens, Baas. Also it is the nature of cannibals to prefer thi man to fat beef. The devil that is in them gives them that taste Baas, just as he makes me like gin, or you turn you head to look at pretty women, as those Zulus say you alway did in their country, especially at a certain witch who wa named Mameena and whom you kissed before everybody—

Here I turned my head to look at Hans, purposing t smite him with words, or physically, since to have thi Mameena myth, of which I have detailed the origin in th book called Child of Storm, re-arise out of his hideous littl mouth was too much But before I could get out a syllabl he held up his finger and whispered,

'Hush! the dawn breaks and they come. I hear them.'

I listened intently but could distinguish nothing. Only straining my eyes, presently I thought that about a hundre yards down the slope beneath us in the dim light I caugh sight of ghostlike figures flitting from tree to tree; also that these figures were drawing neater.

'Look out!' I said to Robertson on my right, 'I believe they are coming.'

'Man,' he answered sternly, 'I hope so, for whom else have I wanted to meet all these days?'

Now the figures vanished into a little fold of the ground A minute or so later they re-appeared upon its hither side where such light as there was from the fading stars and the gathering dawn fell full upon them, for here were no trees, looked and a thrill of horror went through me, for with one glance I recognised that these were not the men whom we had been following. To begin with, there were many more of them, quite a hundred. I should think, also they had painted shields, wore teathers in their hair, and generally so far as a could judge, seemed to be fat and fresh.

'We have been led into an ambush.' I said first in Zula to Umslopogaas immediately in front, and then in English to Robertson.

'If so man, we must just do the best we can,' answered the latter, 'but God help my poor daughter, for those other devils will have taken her away, leaving their brethren to make an end of us.'

'It is so, Macumazahn, broke in Umslopogaas, 'Well, what-

Meanwhile Robertson, Hans and I, standing on some stone at the back, kept up a continual fire upon them, shooting over the heads of the Zulus, who were playing their part like mer Yes, they shrank back, leaving many dead behind them. The a captain tried to gather them for another rush, and one more they moved forward. I killed that captain with a revolve shot, for my rifle had become too hot to hold, and at the sigl of his fall, they broke and ran back into the little hollowhere our bullets could not reach them.

So far we had held our own, but at a price, for three of the Zulus were now dead and three more wounded, one of the severely, the other two but enough to cripple them. In fac now there were left of them but three untouched men, an Umslopogaas, so that in all for fighting purposes we were be seven. What availed it that we had killed a great number of these Amahagger, when we were but seven? How could seve men withstand such another onslaught?

There in the pale light of the dawn we looked at each other dismayed.

'Now,' said Umslopogaas, leaning on his red axe, 'their remains but one thing to do, make a good end, though I would that it were in a greater cause. At least we must either figlior fly,' and he looked down at the wounded.

'Think not of us, Fisher,' murmured one of them, the man who had a mortal hurt. If it is best, kill us and begot that you may live to bear the Axe in years to come.'

'Well spoken!' said Umslopogaas, and again stood still while, then added, 'The word is with you, Macumazahn, whare our captain

I set our the situation to Robertson and Hans as briefl as I could, showing that there was a chance of life if we rai but so far as I could see, none if we stayed.

'Go if you use, Quatermain,' answered the Captain, 'bi I shall stop and die here, for since my girl is gone I thin I'm better dead.'

I motioned to Hans to speak

'Baas,' he answered, the Great Medicine is here with a upon the earth and your reverend tather, the Predikant, with us in the sky, so I hink we had better stop here and d what we can, especially as I do not want to see those receany more at present.'

'So do I,' I said briefly, giving no reasons.

So we made ready for the next attack which we knew woul be the last, strengthening our latte wall and dragging th dead Amahagger up against it as an added protection. As we were thus engaged the sun rose and in its first beams, some miles away on the opposing slopes of the mountain looking tiny against the black background of the precipice, we saw a party of men creeping forward. Lifting my glasses I studied it and perceived that in its midst was a litter.

'There goes your daughter,' I said, and handed the glasses to Robertson.

'Oh! my God.' he answered, 'those villains have outwitted us after all.'

Another minute and the litter, or rather the chair with its escort, had vanished into the shadow of the great cliffs, probably up some pass which we could not see.

Next moment our thoughts were otherwise engaged, since from various symptoms we gathered that the attack was about to be renewed. Spears upon which shone the light of the rising sun, appeared above the edge of the ground-fold that I have mentioned, which to the east increased to a deep, bush-clad ravine. Also there were voices as of leaders encouraging their men to a desperate effort.

'They are coming.' I said to Robertson.

'Yes,' he answered, 'they are coming and we are going. a queer end to the thing we call life, isn't it, Quatermain, hang it all! I wonder what's beyond? Not much for me. spect, but whatever it is could scarcely be worse than what gone through here below in one way and another.'

There's hope for all of us! I replied as cheerfully as I ald, for the man's deep degression disturbed me.

Mayhap, Quatermain, for who knows the infinite mercy whatever made us as we are? My old Mother used to each of it and I remember her words now. But in my case I spect it will stop at hope, or sleep, and if it wasn't for Inex, d not mind so much, for I tell you I've had enough of the orld and life. Look, there's one of them. Take that, you lack devill' and lifting his rifle he aimed and fired at an imahagger who appeared upon the size of the fold of ground. What is more he hit him, for I saw the man double up and fail jackwards.

Then the game began afresh, for the commission of suppose they were cannibals like their brackress, creat out of theires, advancing on their stomachs or their barring and knows, so as to offer a smaller mark, and dragging feetings. There a living and slender tree-trun's with which elearly they may are and to figure

Of course I blazed away at them, pretty carefully too, for I was determined that what I believed to be the last exercise of the gift of shooting that has been given to me, should prove a record. Therefore I selected my men and even where I would hit them, and as subsequent examination showed, I made no mistakes in the seven or eight shots that I fired. But all the while, like poor Captain Robertson. I was thinking of other things: namely, where I was bound for presently and if I should meet certain folk there and what was the meaning of this show called Life, which unless it leads somewhere, according to my judgment has none at all. Until these questions were solved, however, my duty was to kill as many of those ruffians as I could, and this I did with finish and despatch.

Robertson and Hans were firing also, with more or less success, but there were too many to be stopped by our three rifles. Still they came on till at length their fierce faces were within a few yards of our little parapet and Umslopogaas had lifted his great axe to give them greeting. They paused a moment before making their final rush, and so did we to slip in fresh cartridges

'Die well, Hans,' I said, 'and if you get there first, wait for me on the other side'

'Yes, Baas, I always meant to do that, though not yet. We are not going to die this time, Baas. Those who have the Great Medicine don't die, it is the others who die, like that fellow,' and he pointed to an Amahagger who went recling round and round with a bullet from his Winchester through the middle, for he had fired in the midst of his remarks.

'Curse -1 mean bless -the Great Medicine,' I said as I lifted my rifle to my shoulder.

At that moment all those Amahagger—there were about sixty of them left—became seized with a certain perturbation. They stood still, they stared towards the fold of ground out of which they had emerged; they called to each other words which I did not catch, and then—they turned to run.

Umslopogaas saw, and with a leader's instinct, acted. Springing over the parapet, followed by his remaining Zulus of the Axe, he leapt upon them with a roar. Down they went before Inkovikaus, like corn before a sickle. The thing was marvellous to see, it was like the charge of a leopard, so swift was the rush and so lightning-like were the strokes or rather the pecks of that flashing axe, for now he was tapping at their heads or spines with the gouge-like point upon its back. Nor were these the only victims, for those brave followers of his also did their part. In a minute all who remained upon their feet of the Amahagger were in full flight, vanishing this way and that among the trees. Hans fired a parting shot after the last of them, then sat down upon a stone and finding his corn-cob pipe, proceeded to fill it.

'The Great Medicine, Baas,' he began sententiously, 'or perhaps your reverend father, the Predikant—' Here he paused and pointed doubtfully with the bowl of the pipe towards the fold in the ground, adding, 'Here it is, but I think it must be your reverend father, not the Great Medicine, yes, the Predikant himself, returned from Heaven, the Place of Fires!'

Looking vaguely in the direction indicated, for I could not conceive what he meant and thought that the excitement must have made him mad, I perceived a venerable old man with a long white beard and clothed in a flowing garment, also white, who reminded me of Father Christmas at a child's party, walking towards us and radiating benignancy. Also behind him I perceived a whole forest of spear points emerging from the gully. He seemed to take it for granted that we should not at him, for he came on quite unconcerned, carefully g his way among the corpses. When he was near enough opped and said in a kind of Arabic which I could stand, rect you, Strangers, in the name of her I serve. I see am just in time, but this does not surprise me, since she hat it would be so. You seem to have done very well hese dogs,' and he prodded a dead Amahagger with his lled foot. 'Yes, very well indeed. You must be great ors.'

in he paused and we stared at each other.

THROUGH THE MOUNTAIN WALL

'THESE do not seem to be friends of yours,' I said pointing to the fallen. 'And yet,' I added, nodding towards the spearmen, who were now emerging from the gully, 'they are very like your friends."

'Puppies from the same litter are often alike, yet when they grow up sometimes they fight each other,' replied Father Christmas blandly. 'At least these come to save and not to kill you. Look! they kill the others, and he pointed to them making an end of some of the wounded men. 'But who are these?' and he glanced with evident astonishment, first at the fearsome-looking Umslopogaas and then at the grotesque Hans. 'Nay, answer not, you must be weary and need rest. Afterwards we can talk.'

'Well, as a matter of fact we have not yet breakfasted,' I replied. 'Also I have business to attend to here,' and I glanced at our wounded.

The old fellow nodded and went to speak to the captains of his force, doubtless as to the pursuit of the enemy, for presently I saw a company spring forward on their tracks. Then, assisted by Hans and the remaining Zulus of whom one was Goroko. I turned to attend to our own people. The task proved lighter than I expected, since the badly injured man was dead or dying and the hurts of the two others were in their legs and comparatively slight, such as Goroko could doctor in his own native fashion.

After this, taking Hans to guard my back, I went down to the stream and washed myself. Then I returned and ate, wondering the while that I could do so with appetite after the terrible dangers which we had passed. Still, we had passed them, and Robertson. Emslopogaas with three of his men, I and Hans were quite unharmed, a fact for which I returned thanks in silence but sincerely enough to Providence.

Hans also returned thanks in his own fashion, after he had filled himself, not before, and lit his corn-cob pipe. But Robertson made no remark: indeed, when he had satisfied his natural cravings, he rose and walking a few paces forward, stood staring at the cleft in the mountain cliff into which he had seen the litter vanish that bore his daughter to some fate unknown.

Even the great fight that we had fought and the victory we had won against overpowering odds did not appear to impress him. He only glared at the mountain into the heart of which Inez had been raped away, and shook his fist. Since she was gone all else went for nothing, so much so that he did not offer to assist with the wounded Zulus or show curiosity about the strange old man by whom we had been rescued.

'The Great Medicine, Baas,' said Hans in a bewildered way, 'is even more powerful than I thought. Not only has it brought us safely through the fighting and without a scratch, for those Zulus there do not matter and there will be less cooking for me to do now that they are gone; it has also brought down your reverend father the Predikant from the Place of Fires in Heaven, somewhat changed from what I remember him, it is true, but still without doubt the same. When I make my report to him presently, if he can understand my tal shall—'

'Stop your infernal nonsense, you son of a donkey,' I b in, for at this moment old Father Christmas, smiling I benignly than before, re-appeared from the kloof into w he had vanished and advanced towards us bowing with n politeness.

Having seated himself upon the little wall that we built up, he contemplated us, stroking his beautiful v beard, then said, addressing me,

'Of a certainty you should be proud who with a few defeated so many. Still, had I not been ordered to com speed, I think that by now you would have been as those and he looked towards the dead Zulus who were laid or distance like men asleep, while their companions sought i place to bury them.

'Ordered by whom?' I asked.

There is only one who can order, he answered with astonishment. "She-who-commands, She-who-is-everlasting

It occurred to me that this must be some Arabic idion the Elernal Feminine, but I only looked vague and said,

'It would appear that there are some whom this exa everlasting She cannot command; those who attacked also those who have fled away yonder,' and I waved my I towards the mountain.

'No command is absolute; in every country there are rebels, even, as I have heard, in Heaven above us. But, Wanderer, what is your name?'

'Watcher-by-Night,' I answered.

'Ah! a good name for one who must have watched well by night, and by day too, to reach this country living where She-who-commands says that no man of your colour has set foot for many generations. Indeed, I think she told me once that two thousand years had gone by since she spoke to a white man in the City of Kôr.

'Did she indeed?' I exclaimed, stifling a cough.

'You do not believe me,' he went on, smiling. 'Well, She-who-commands can explain matters for herself better than I who was not alive two thousand years ago, so far as I remember. But what must I call him with the Axe?'

'Warrior is his name.'

'Again a good name, as to judge by the wounds on them, certain of those rebels I think are now telling each other in Hell. And this man, if indeed he be a man—' he added, looking doubtfully at Hans.

'Light-in-Darkness is his name.'

'I see, doubtless because his colour is that of the winter sun in thick fog, or a bad egg broken into milk. And the other white man who mutters and whose brow is like a storm?'

'He is called Avenger; you will learn why later on,' I answered impatiently, for I grew tired of this catechism, adding, 'And what are you called and, if you are pleased to tell it to us, upon what errand do you visit us in so fortunate an hour?'

'I am named Billali,' he answered, 'the servant and messenger of She-who-commands, and I was sent to save you and to bring you safely to her.'

'How can this be, Billali, seeing that none knew of our coming?'

'Yet She-who-commands knew,' he said with his benignant smile. 'Indeed, I think that she learned of it some moons ago through a message that was sent to her and so arranged all things that you should be guided safely to her secret home; since otherwise how would you have passed a great pathless swamp with the loss, I think she said, of but one man whom a snake bit?'

Now I stared at the old fellow, for how could he know of or so later, feeling wonderfully refreshed. Hans, when I closed my eyes was already slumbering at my feed up like a dog on a spot where the sun struck hothered me by saying, wake, Baas, they are here!

sprang up, snatching at my rifle, for I thought that he int that we were being attacked again, to see Billali accing at the head of a train of four litters made of bambon grass mats for curtains and coverings, each of which we fied by stalwart Amahagger, as I supposed that they must

Two of these, the finest. Billali indicated were for bertson and myself, and the two others for the wounder islopogaas and the remaining Zulus evidently were exted to walk, as was Hans.

How did you make these so quickly? I asked, surveying ir elegant and indeed artistic workmanship.

We did not make them. Watcher-by-Night, we brough m with us folded up She-who-commands looked in he ss and said that four would be needed, besides my ow ich is yonder, two for white lords and two for wounde ck men, which you see is the number required.

Yes, I answered vaguely, marvelling what kind of a glassas that gave the lady this information.

Before I could inquire upon the point Billali added, You will be glad to learn that my men caught some of one rebels who dared to attack you, eight or ten of their o had been hurt by your missiles or axe-cuts, and put their death in the proper fashion—yes, quite the proper fashion if he smiled a little. The rest had gone too far where uld have been dangerous to follow them among the rock ter now, my lord Watcher-by-Night, for the road is steed if we must travel fast if we would reach the place when the smiles in the smiles in the ancient holy city, before moon sinks behind the cliffs to-night.

so having explained matters to Robertson and Umslope is, who announced that nothing would induce him to be ried like an old woman, or a corpse upon a shield, an in that the hurt Zulus were comfortably accommodates bertson and I got into our litters, which proved to be ightfully easy and restful.

Then when our gear was collected by the hook-nose bearers to whom we were obliged to trust it, though we kept with us our rifles and a certain amount of ammunition, we started. First went a number of Billali's spearmen, then came the litters with the wounded alongside of which Umslopogaas and his three uninjured Zulus stalked or trotted, then another litter containing Billali, then my own by which ran Hans, and Robertson's, and lastly the rest of the Amahagger and the relief bearers.

'I see now, Baas,' said Hans, thrusting his head between my curtains, 'that vonder Whitebeard cannot be your reverend father, the Predikant, after all.'

'Why not?' I asked, though the fact was fairly obvious.

Because, Baas, if he were, he would not have left Hans. of whom he always thought so well, to run in the sun like a dog, while he and others travel in carriages like great white ladies.'

'You had better save your breath instead of talking nonsense, Hans,' I said, 'since I believe that you have a long way to go.'

In fact, it proved to be a very long way indeed, especially after we began to breast the mountain, we must travel wly. We started about ten o'clock in the morning, for the ht which after all did not take long-had, it will be rememred, begun shortly after dawn, and it was three in the afteron before we reached the base of the towering cliff which have mentioned.

Here, at the foot of a remarkable, isolated column of rock, n which I was destined to see a strange sight in the after days, e halted and ate of the remaining food which we had brought ith us, while the Amahagger consumed their own, that eemed to consist largely of curdled milk, such as the Zulus all maas, and lumps of a kind of bread.

I noted that they were a very curious people who fed in silence and on whose handsome, solemn faces one never saw a smile. Somehow it gave me the creeps to look at them. Robertson was affected in the same way, for in one of the rare intervals of his abstraction he remarked that they were 'no canny.' Then he added,

'Ask you old wizard who might be one of the Bible prophets come to life-what those man-eating devils have done with my

I did so, and Billali answered,

Say that they have taken her away to make a queen of her, since having rebelled against their own queen, they must have another who is white. Say too that She-who-commands will wage war on them and perhaps win her back, unless they kill her first.'

'Ah!' Robertson repeated when I had translated, 'unless' they kill her first—or worse'. Then he relapsed into his usual silence.

Presently we started on again, heading straight for what looked like a sheer wall of black rock a thousand feet or more in height, up a path so steep that Robertson and I got out and walked, or rather scrambled, in order to ease the bearers. Billali, I noticed, remained in his litter. The convenience of the bearers did not trouble him; he only ordered an extra gang to the poles. I could not imagine how we were to negotiate this precipice. Nor could Umslopogaas, who looked at it and said.

'If we are to climb that, Macumazahn, I think that the only one who will live to get to the top will be that little vellow monkey of yours, and he pointed with his axe at Hans.

If I do, replied that worthy, much nettled, for he hated to be called a 'yellow monkey' by the Zulus, 'be sure that I will roll down stones upon any black butcher whom I see sprawling upon the chiff below'

Umslopogaas smiled grimly, for he had a sense of humour and could appreciate a repartee even when it hit him hard. Then we stopped talking for the climb took all our breath.

At length we came to the cliff face where, to all appearance, our journey must end. Suddenly, however, out of the blind black wall in front of us started the apparition of a tall man armed with a great spear and wearing a white robe, who challenged us hoarsely

Suddenly he stood before us, as a ghost might do, though-whence he came we could not see. Presently the mystery was explained. Here in the cliff face there was a cleft, though one invisible even from a few paces away, since its outer edge projected over the inner wall of rock. Moreover, this opening was not above four feet in width, a mere slit in the huge mountain mass caused by some titanic convulsion in past ages. For it was a definite split since, once entered, far, far above could be traced a faint line of light coming from the sky, although the gloom of the passage was such that torches, which were stored at hand, must be used by those who threaded it. One man could have held the place against a hundred—until he was killed. Still, it was guarded, not only at the mouth where the warrior had appeared, but further along at every turn in the jagged chasm, and these were many.

Into this grim place we went. The Zulus did not like it at all, for they are a light-loving people and I noted that even Umslopogaas seemed scared and hung back a little. Nor did Hans, who with his usual suspicion, feared some trap; nor, for the matter of that, did I, though I thought it well to appear much interested. Only Robertson seemed quite indifferent and trudged along stolidly after a man carrying a torch.

Old Billali put his head out of the litter and shouted back to me to fear nothing, since there were no pitfalls in the path, his voice echoing strangely between those narrow walls of measureless height.

For half an hour or more we pursued this dreary, winding nath round the corners of which the draught tore in gusts so fierce that more than once the litters with the wounded men and those who bore them were nearly blown over. It was safe enough, however, since on either side of us, smooth and without break, rose the sheer walls of rock over which lav the tiny ribbon of blue sky. At length the cleft widened somewhat and the light grew stronger, making the torches unnecessary.

Then of a sudden we came to its end and found ourselves unon a little plateau in the mountainside. Behind us for a thousand feet or so rose the sheer rock wall as it did upon the outer face, while in front and beneath, far beneath, was a beautiful plain circular in shape and of great extent, which plain was everywhere surrounded, so far as I could see, by the same wall of rock. In short, notwithstanding its enormous size, without doubt it was neither more nor less than the crater of a vast extinct volcano. Lastly, not far from the centre of this plain was what appeared to be a city, since through my glasses I could see great walls built of stone, and what I thought were houses, all of them of a character more substantial than any that I had discovered in the wilds of Africa. I went to Billali's litter and asked him who lived in the City.

No one, he answered, 'it has been dead for thousands of years, but She-who-commands is camped there at present with an army, and thither we go at once. Forward, bearers." So Robertson and I having re-entered our litters, we started on down hill at a rapid pace, for the road, though steep, was sale and kept in good order. All the rest of that afternoon we travelled and by sunset reached the ad-growing moon grew strong enough to enable us to pr Umslopogaas came up and spoke to me.

'Here is a fortress indeed, Macamazahn,' he said, none can climb that fence of rock in which the hole io be few and small."

'Yes,' I answered, 'but it is one out of which thos are in, would find it difficult to get out. We are buffal a pit, Umslopogaas.'

That is so, he answered, I have thought it alread if any would meddle with us we still have our horns ar toss for a while.'

Then he went back to his men.

The sunset in that great solemn place was a won thing to see. First of all the measureless crater was filled light like a bowl with fire. Then as the great orb sank to the western cliff, half of the plain became quite dark shadows seemed to rush forward over the eastern part surface, till that too was swallowed up in gloom and little while there remained only a glow reflected from the face and from the sky above, while on the crest of the profession rock played strange and glorious fires. Presently these vanished and the world was dark

Then the half moon broke from behind a bank of c and by its silver, uncertain light we struggled forward a the flat plain, rather slowly now, for even the fron muscl those bearers grew fired. I could not see much of it, gathered that we were passing through crops, very fine to judge by their height, as doubtless they would be upor avaisable also once or twice we splished through streat

At length, being tired and lulled by the swaying of itter and by the sound of a weird, low chant that the besad set up now that they neared home and were afraid a stack, I sank into a doze. When I awoke again it will ind that the litter had halted and to hear the voice of B ay, 'Descend, White Lords, and come with your companie black Warrior and the yellow man who is named Lightarkness. She-who-commands desires to see you at effore you eat and sleep, and must not be kept waiting, of for the others, they will be cared for till you return.'

THE WHITE WITCH

I DESCENDED from the litter and to'd the others what the old fellow had said. Robertson did not want to come, and indeed refused to do so until I suggested to him that such conduct might prejudice a powerful person against us. Umslopogaas was indifferent, putting, as he remarked, no faith in a ruler who was a woman.

Only Hans, although he was so tired, acquiesced with some eagerness, the fact being that his brain was more alert and that he had all the curiosity of the monkey tribe which he so much resembled in appearance, and wanted to see this queen whom Zikali revered.

In the end we started, conducted by Billali and by men who carried torches whereof the light showed me that we were passing between houses, or at any rate walls that had been those of houses, and along what seemed to be a paved street.

Walking under what I took to be a great arch or pervise, we came into a court that was full of towering pillars but unroofed, for I could see the stars above. At its end we entered a building of which the doorway was hung with mats, to find that it was lighted with lamps and that all down its length on either side guards with long spears stood at intervals.

'Oh, Baas,' said Hans hasitatingly, 'this is the mouth of trap,' while Umslopogaas glared about him suspiciously, agering the handle of his great axe.

'Be silent.' I answered, 'All this mountain is a trap, therefore nother does not matter, and we have our pistols."

Walking forward between the double line of guards who teed immovable as statues, we came to some curtains hung it the end of a long narrow hall which, although I know little if such things, were. I noted, made of rich stuff embroidered a colours and with golden threads. Before these curtains stillall motioned us to halt.

After a whispered colloquy with someone beyond carried on through the join of the curtains, he vanished between them, leaving us alone for five minutes or more. At length they opened and a tall and elegant woman with an Arab cast of countenance and clad in white robes, appeared and beckoned to us to enter. She did not speak or answer when I spoke to her, which was not wonderful as afterwards I discovered that she was a mute. We went in, I wondering very much what we were going to see.

On the further side of the curtains was a room of no great size illumined with lamps of which the light fell upon sculptured walls. It looked to me as though it might once have been the inmost court or a sanctuary of some temple, for at its head was a dais upon which once perhaps had stood the shrine or statue of a god. On this dais there was now a couch and on the couch—a goddess!

There she sat, straight and still, clothed in shining white and veiled, but with her draperies so arranged that they emphasised rather than concealed the wonderful elegance of her tall form. From beneath the veil, which was such as a bride wears, appeared two plaits of glossy, raven hair of great length, to the end of each of which was suspended a single large pearl. On either side of her stood a tall woman like to her who had led us through the curtains, and on his knees in front, but to the right, knelt Billali.

About this seated personage there was an air of singular majesty, such as might pervade a queen as fancy paints her, though she had a nobler figure than any queen I ever saw depicted. Mystery seemed to flow from her; it clothed her like the veil she wore, which of course heightened the effect. Beauty flowed from her also, although it was shrouded I knew that it was there, no veil or coverings could obscure it—at least, to my imagination. Moreover she breathed out power also, one felt it in the air as one feels a thunderstorm before it breaks, and it seemed to me that this power was not quite human, that it drew its strength from afar and dwelt a stranger to the earth.

To tell the truth, although my curiosity, always strong, was enormously excited and though now I felt glad that I had attempted this journey with all its perils. I was horribly afraid, so much afraid that I should have liked to turn and run away. From the beginning I knew myself to be in the presence of an unearthly being clothed in soft and perfect woman's flesh, something alien, too, and different from our human race.

What a picture it all made! There she sat, quiet and stately as a perfect marble statue; only her breast, rising and falling beneath the white robe, showed that she was alive and breathed as others do. Another thing showed it also—her eyes. At first I could not see them through the veil, but presently, either because I grew accustomed to the light, or because they brightened as those of certain animals have power to do when they watch intently, it ceased to be a covering to them. Distinctly I saw them now, large and dark and splendid with a tinge of deep blue in the iris; alluring and yet awful in their majestic aloofness which seemed to look through and beyond, to embrace all without seeking and without effort. Those eyes were like windows through which light flows from within, a light of the spirit.

I glanced round to see the effect of this vision upon my companions. It was most peculiar. Hans had sunk to his knees; his hands were joined in the attitude of prayer and his ugly little face reminded me of that of a big fish out of water and dying from excess of air. Robertson, startled out of his abstraction, stared at the royal-looking woman on the couch with his mouth open.

'Man,' he whispered, 'I've got them back although I have touched nothing for weeks, only this time they are lovely. For yon's no human lady, I feel it in my bones.'

Umslopogaas stood great and grim, his hands resting on the handle of his tall axe; and he stared also, the blood pulsing against the skin that covered the hole in his head.

'Watcher-by-Night,' he said to me in his deep voice, but also speaking in a whisper, 'this chieftainess is not one woman, but all women. Beneath those robes of hers I seem to see the beauty of one who has "gone Beyond," of the Lily who is lost to me. Do you feel it thus, Macumazahn?'

Now that he mentioned it, certainly I did; indeed, I had felt it all along although amid the rush of sensations this one had scarcely disentangled itself in my mind. I looked at the draped shape and saw-well, never mind whom I saw; it was not one only but several in sequence; also a woman who at that time I did not know although I came to know her afterwards, too well, perhaps, or at any rate quite enough to puzzle me. The odd thing was that in this hallucination the personalities of these individuals seemed to overlap and merge, till at last I began to wonder whether they were not parts of the same entity or being, manifesting itself in sundry shapes, yet springing from one centre, as different coloured rays flow from the same crystal, while the beams from their source of light shift and change. But the fancy is too metaphysical for my poor powers to express as clearly as I would. Also no doubt it was but a hallucination that had its origin, perhaps, in the mischievous brain of her who sat before us t length she spoke and her voice sounded like silver bells id over water in a great calm. It was low and sweet, oh! weet that at its first notes for a moment my senses seemed swoon and my pulse to stop. It was to me that she adseed herself.

My servant here,' and ever so slightly she turned her head vards the kneeling Billali, 'tells me that you who are ned Watcher-in-the-Night, understand the tongue in which peak to you. Is it so?'

I understand Arabic of a kind well enough, having learned on the East Coast and from Arabs in past years, but not ch Arabic as you use, O—— and I paused.

'Call me Hiya,' she broke in, which is my title here, meaning as you know, She, or Woman. Or if that does not please ou, call me Ayesha. It would rejoice me after so long to hear to name I bore spoken by the lips of one of my colour and f gentle blood.'

I blushed at the compliment so artfully conveyed, and epeated stupidly enough,

'-Not such Arabic as you use, O-Ayesha.'

I thought that you would like the sound of the word better than that of Hiya, though afterwards I will teach you to pronounce it as you should, O—have you any other name save Watcher-by-Night, which seems also to be a title?

'Yes,' I answered 'Allan.'

'-O-Allan. Tell me of these,' she went on quickly, indicating my companions with a sweep of her slender hand, for they do not speak Arabic, I think. Or stay, I will tell you of them and you shall say if I do so rightly. This one,3 and she nodded towards Robertson, 'is a man bemused. There comes from him a colour which I see if you cannot, and that colour betokens a desire for revenge, though I think that in his time he has desired other things also, as I remember men. always did from the beginning, to their ruin. Human nature does not change, Allan, and wine and women are ancient snares. Enough of him for this time. The little yellow one there is afraid of me, as are all of you. That is woman's greatest power, although she is so weak and gentle, men are still afraid of her just because they are so foolish that they cannot understand her. To them after a million years she still remains the Unknown and to us all the Unknown is also the awful. Do you remember the proverb of the Romans that says it well and briefly?'

I nodded, for it was one of the Latin tags that my father had taught me.

'Good. Well, he is a little wild man, is he not, nearer to the apes from whose race our bodies come? But do you know that. Allan?'

I nodded again, and said,

'There are disputes upon the point, Ayesha.'

Yes, they had begun in my day and we will discuss them ater. Still, I say-nearer to the ape than you or I, and therefore of interest, as the germ of things is always. Yet he has qualities, I think; cunning, and fidelity and love which in its round is all in all. Do you understand, Allan, that love is all in all?"

I answered warily that it depended upon what she meant by love, to which she replied that she would explain afterwards when we had leisure to talk, adding,

What this little vellow monkey understands by it at least has served you well, or so I believe. You shall tell me the tale of it some day. Now of the last, this Black One. Here I think is a man indeed, a warrior of warriors such as there used to be in the early world, if a savage. Well, believe me. Allan, savages are often the best. Moreover, all are still savage at heart, even you and I. For what is termed culture is but coat upon coat of paint laid on to hide our native colour, and often there is poison in the paint. That axe of his has drunk deep, I think, though always in fair fight; and I say that it shall drink deeper yet. Have I read these men aright, Allan?'

'Not so ill,' I answered.

'I thought it,' she said with a musical laugh, 'although at this place I rust and grow dull like an unused sword. Now you would rest. Go-all of you. To-morrow you and I will talk alone. Fear nothing for your safety; you are watched by my slaves and I watch my slaves. Until to-morrow, then, farewell. Go now, eat and sleep, as alas we all must do who linger on this ball of earth and cling to a life we should do well to lose. Billali, lead them hence,' and she waved her hand to signify that the audience was ended.

At this sign Hans, who apparently was still much afraid, rose from his knees and literally bolted through the curtains. Robertson followed him. Umslopogaas stood for a moment, drew himself up and lifting the great axe, cried Bayéte, after which he too turned and went.

'What does that word mean, Allan?' she asked. I explained that it was the salutation which the Zulu people only give to kings.

'Did I not say that savages are often the best?' she exclaimed in a gratified voice. The white man, your companion, gave me no salute, but the Black One knows when he stands before a woman who is royal."

'He too is of royal blood in his own land,' I said.

'If so, we are akin, Allan.'

Then I bowed deeply to her in my best manner and rising from her couch for the first time she stood up, looking very tall and commanding, and bowed back.

After this I went to find the others on the further side of the curtains, except Hans, who had run down the long narrow hall and through the mats at its end. We followed, marching with dignity behind Billali between the double line of guards, who raised their spears as we passed them, and on the further side of the mats discovered Hans, still looking terrified.

'Baas,' he said to me as we threaded our way through the court of columns, in my life I have seen all kinds of dreadful things and faced them, but never have I been so much afraid as I am of that white witch. Baas, I think that she is the devil of whom your reverend father, the Predikant, used to talk so much, or perhaps his wife.'

'If so, Hans,' I answered, 'the devil is not so black as he is painted. But I advise you to be careful of what you say as she may have long ears.'

'It doesn't matter at all what one says, Baas, because she reads thoughts before they pass the lips. I felt her doing it there in that room. And do you be careful, Baas, or she will eat up your spirit and make you fall in love with her, who, I expect, is very ugly indeed, since otherwise she would not wear a veil. Whoever saw a pretty woman tie up her head in a sack. Baas?

Perhaps she does this because she is so beautiful, Hans, she fears the hearts of men who look upon her would melt."

'Oh, no, Baas, all women want to melt men's hearts; the more the better. They seem to have other things in their minds, but really they think of nothing else until they are too old and ugly, and it takes them long to be sure of that."

So Hans went on talking his shrewd nonsense till, following so far as I could see the same road as that by which we had come, we reached our quarters, where we found food prepared for us, broiled goat's flesh with corncakes and milk, I think it was; also beds for us two white men covered with skin rugs and blankets woven of wool.

These quarters, I should explain, consisted of rooms in a haps it will shield you from harm at those hands that are shaped of ivory."

'Zikali is another of the tribe,' I answered, laughing, 'although less beautiful to see. Also I am not afraid of any of them, and from this one, if she be more than some white woman whom it pleases to veil herself. I shall hope to gather wisdom.'

'Yes, Macumazahn, such wisdom as Spirits and the deadhave to give.'

'Mayhap, Umslopogaas, but we came here to seek Spirits and the dead, did we not?"

'Aye,' answered Umslopogaas, 'these and war, and I think that we shall find enough of all three. Only I hope that war will come the first, lest the Spirits and the dead should bewitch me and take away my skill and courage.'

Then we parted, and too tired even to wonder any more, I threw myself down on my bed and slept.

I was awakened when the sun was already high, by the sound of Robertson, who was on his knees, praying aloud as usual, a habit of his which I confess got on my nerves. Prayer, in my opinion, is a private matter between man and his Creator, that is, except in church; further, I did not in the least wish to hear all about Robertson's sins, which seemed to have been many and peculiar. It is bad enough to have to bear the builden of one's own transgressions without learning of those of other people, that is, unless one is a priest and must do so professionally. So I jumped up to escape and make arrangements for a wash, only to butt into old Billali, who was standing in the doorway contemplating Robertson withmuch interest and stroking his white beard.

He greeted me with his courteous bow and said,

'Tell your companion. O Watcher, that it is not necessary for him to go upon his knees to She-who-commands—and-must be obeyed, he added with emphasis, 'when he is not in her presence, and that even then he would do well to keep silent, since so much talking in a strange tongue might trouble her.'

I burst out laughing and answered.

'He does not go upon his knees and pray to She-who-commands, but to the Great One who is in the sky.

'Indeed, Watcher. Well, here we only know a Great One who is upon the earth, though it is true that perhaps she visits the skies sometimes.'

'Is it so, Billali?' I answered incredulously. 'And now I would ask you to take me to some place where I can bathe.'

'It is ready,' he replied. 'Come.'

So I called to Hans, who was hanging about with a rifle on his arm, to follow with a cloth and soap, of which fortunately we had a couple of pieces left, and we started along what had once been a paved roadway running between stone houses, whereof the time-eaten ruins still remained on either side.

'Who and what is this Queen of yours, Billali?' I asked as we went. 'Surely she is not of the Amahagger blood.'

'Ask it of herself, O Watcher, for I cannot tell you. All I know is that I can trace my own family for ten generations and that my tenth forefather told his son on his deathbed, for the saying has come down through his descendants-that when he was young She-who-Commands had ruled the land for more scores of years than he could count months of life.'

I stopped and stared at him, since the lie was so amazing that it seemed to deprive me of the power of motion. Noting my very obvious disbelief he continued blandly.

'If you doubt, ask. And now here is where you may bathe.'

Then he led me through an arched doorway and down a wrecked passage to what very obviously once had been a splendid bath-house such as some I have seen pictures of that were built by the Romans. Its size was that of a large room; it was constructed of a kind of marble with a sloping bottom that varied from three to seven feet in depth, and water still ran in and out of it through large glazed pipes. Moreover around it was a footway about five feet across, from which opened chambers, unroofed now, that the bathers used as dressing-rooms, while between these chambers stood the remains of statues. One at the end indeed, where an alcove had protected it from sun and weather, was still quite perfect, except for the outstretched arms which were gone (the right hand I noticed lying at the bottom of the bath). It was that of a nude young woman in the autitude of diving, a very beautiful bit of work. I thought though of course I am no judge of sculpture. Even the antile mingled with trepidation upon the girl's face was mont nationally postrayed.

This statue showed two things, that the bath was used by lemales and that the people who had boile it were highly civilised, also that they followed to an advanced it somewhat Enstern race, since the girls now war, it anything Semilio in character, and her lips, though pressly aftered, were full For the test, the basin was so clear that I presente it must have been made ready for me or other recent bathers, and at its bottom I discovered gratings and broken pipes of earthenware which suggested that in the old days the water could be warmed by means of a furnace.

This relic of a long-past civilisation excited Hans even more than it did myself, since having never seen anything of the sort, he thought it so strange that, as he informed me, he imagined that it must have been built by witchcraft. In it I had a most delightful and much-needed bath. Even Hans was persunded to follow my example—a thing I had rarely known him to do before—and seated in its shallowest part, splashed some water over his yellow, wrinkled anatomy. Then we returned to our house, where I found an excellent breakfast had been provided which was brought to us by tall, silent, handsome women who surveyed us out of the corners of their eyes, but said nothing.

Shortly after 1 had finished my meal, Billali, who had disappeared, came back again and said that She-who-commands desired my presence as she would speak with me; also that 1 must come alone. So, after attending to the wounded, who both seemed to be getting on well, I went followed by Hans armed with his rifle, though I only carried my revolver. Robertson wished to accompany me, as he did not seem to care about being left alone with the Zulus in that strange place, but this Billali would not allow. Indeed, when he persisted two great men stepped forward and crossed their spears before him in a somewhat threatening fashion. Then at my entirety for I leared lest trouble should arise, he gave in and returned to the house.

I ollowing our path of the night before, we walked up a finned street which I could see was only one of scores in what had once been a very great city, until we came to the archway that I have mentioned a large one now overgrown with plants that from their vellow, sweet-scented bloom I judged to be a species of wallflower, also with a kind of houseleek or saxifrage

there Hans was stopped by guards. Billah explaining to me that he must await my return, an order which he obeyed unwillingly enough Then I went on down the narrow passage, lined as before by guards who stood silent as statues, and came to the curtains at the end. Before these at a motion-from Billah, who did not seem to dare to speak in this place, I stood still and waited

ALLAN HEARS A STRANGE TALE

For some minutes I remained before those curtains until had it not been for something electric in the air which got into my bones, a kind of force that, perhaps in my fancy only, seemed to pervade the place, I should certainly have grown bored. Indeed I was about to ask my companion way he can not announce our arrival instead of standing there like a street pig with his eyes shut as though in prayer or meditation when the curtains parted and from between them appeared one of those tall waiting women whom we had seen on the previous night. She contemplated us gravely for a few mounts. moved her hand twice, once forward, towards BELL as a signal to him to retire, which he did with great rapidity. and next in a beckoning fashion towards myself to invite me to follow her.

I obeyed, passing between the thick curtains which sha fastened in some way behind me, and found myself in in same roofed and sculptured room that I have already described. Only now there were no lamps, such light as penstrated it coming from an opening above that I could not see. and falling upon the dais at its head, also on her who sat erec the dais.

Yes, there she sat in her white robes and veil the point and centre of a little lake of light, a wondrous and in a sense a spiritual vision, for in truth there was something about her which was not of the world, something that drew and yet frightened me. Still as a statue she sat, like one to whom time is of no account and who has grown weary of motion, and on either side of her yet more still, like caryatides supporting a shrine, stood two of the stately women who were her attendants.

For the rest a sweet and subtle odour pervaded the chamber which took hold of my senses as hasheesh might do, which I was sure proceeded from her, or from her garments, for I could see no perfumes burning. She spoke no word, yet I knew she was inviting me to come nearer and moved forward till I reached a curious carved chair that was placed just beneath the dais, and there halted, not liking to sit down without permission.

For a long while she contemplated me, for as before I could feel her eyes searching me from head to foot and as it were looking through me as though she would discover my very soul. Then at length she moved, waving those two ivory arms of hers outwards with a kind of swimming stroke, whereon the women to right and left of her turned and glided away, I know not whither.

'Sit, Allan,' she said, 'and let us talk, for I think, we have much to say to each other. Have you slept well? And eaten?—though I fear that the food is but rough. Also was the bath made ready for you?"

'Yes, Ayesha,' I answered to all three questions, adding, for I knew not what to say. 'It seems to be a very ancient bath.'

'When last I saw it,' she replied, it was well enough with statues standing round it worked by a sculptor who had seen beauty in his dreams. But in two thousand years—or is it more?—the tooth of Time bites deep, and doubtless like all else in this dead place it is now a ruin.'

I coughed to cover up the exclamation of disbelief that rose to my lips and remarked blandly that two thousand years was certainly a long time

When you say one thing, Allan, and mean another, your Arabic is even more vile than usual and does not serve to cloak your thought.

'It may be so. Ayesha, for I only know that tongue as I do many other of the dialects of Africa by learning it from common men. My own speech is English, in which, if you are acquainted with it. I should prefer to talk.'

I know not English, which doubtless is some language that has arisen since I left the world. Perhaps later you shall teach it to me. I tell you, you anger me whom it is not well to anger, because you believe nothing that passes my lips and yet do not dare to say so.

'How can I believe one. Ayesha, who if I understand aright, speaks of having seen a certain bath two thousand years ago, whereas one hundred years are the full days of man? Forgive me therefore if I cannot believe what I know to be untrue.'

Now I thought that she would be very angry and was sorry that I had spoken. But as it happened she was not.

'You must have courage to give me the lie so coldy-and I like courage, she said, 'who have been cringed to for so long. Indeed, I know that you are brave, who have heard how you bore yourself in the fight yesterday, and much else about you. I think that we shall be friends, but seek no more.

'What else should I seek, Ayesha?' I asked innocently.

'Now you are lying again,' she said, 'who know well that no man who is a man sees a woman who is beautiful and pleases him, without wondering whether, should he desire it. she could come to love him, that is, if she be young.

Which at least is not possible if she has lived two thousand years. Then naturally she would prefer to wear a veil, I said boldly seeking to avoid the argument into which I saw she ished to drag me.

'Ah!' she answered, 'the little yellow man who is named ight-in-Darkness put that thought into your heart, link. Oh, do not trouble as to how I know it, who have many spies here, as he guessed well enough. So a woman who ias lived two thousand years must be hideous and wrinkled, nust she? The stamp of youth and loveliness must long have led from her; of that you, the wise man, are sure. Very well. Now you tempt me to do what I had determined I would not do and you shall pluck the fruit of that tree of curiosity which grows so fast within you. Look, Allan, and say whether I am old and hideous, even though I have lived two thousand years upon the earth and mayhap many more,'

Then she lifted her hands and did something to her veil, so that for a moment—only one moment—her face was revealed, after which the veil fell into its place.

I looked, I saw, and if that chair had lacked a back I believe that I should have fallen out of it to the ground. As for what I saw-well, it cannot be described, at any rate by me, except perhaps as a flash of glory.

Every man has dreamed of perfect beauty, basing his ideas of it perhaps on that of some woman he has met who chanced to take his fancy, with a few accessories from splendid pictures or Greek statues thrown in, plus a garnishment of the imagination. At any rate I have, and here was that perfect beauty multiplied by ten, such beauty, that at the sight of it the senses recled. And yet I repeat that it is not to be described.

I do not know what the nose or the lips were like; in fact, all that I can remember with distinctness is the splendour of the eyes, of which I had caught some hint through her veil on the previous night. Oh, they were wondrous, those eyes, but I cannot tell their colour save that the groundwork of them was black. Moreover they seemed to be more than eves as we understand them. They were indeed windows of the soul, out of which looked thought and majesty and infinite wisdom. mixed with all the allurements and the mystery that we are accustomed to see or to imagine in woman.

Here let me say something at once. If this marvellous creature expected that the revelation of her splendour was going to make me her slave; to cause me to fall in love with her, as it is called, well, she must have been disappointed, for it had no such effect. It frightened and in a sense humbled me, that is all, for I felt myself to be in the presence of something that was not human, something alien to me as a man. which I could fear and even adore as humanity would adore what is Divine, but with which I had no desire to mix. Moreover, was it divine, or was it something very different? I did not know. I only knew that it was not for me; as soon should I have thought of asking for a star to set within my lantern.

I think that she felt this, felt that her stroke had missed, as the French say, that is if she meant to strike at all at this moment Of this I am not certain, for it was in a changed voice, one with a suspicion of chill in it that she said with a

'Do you admit now, Allan, that a woman may be old and . still remain fair and unwrinkled?"

'I admit,' I answered, although I was trembling so much that I could hardly speak with steadiness, 'that a woman may be splendid and lovely beyond anything that the mind of man can conceive, whatever her age, of which I know nothing. I would add this, Ayesha, that I thank you very much for having revealed to me the glory that is hid beneath your veil.

'Why?' she asked, and I thought that I detected curiosity in her question.

'For this reason, Ayesha. Now there is no fear of my troubling you in such a fashion as you seemed to dread a little while ago. As soon would a man desire to court the moon sailing in her silver loveliness through heaven.

'The moon! It is strange that you should compare me to the moon, she said musingly. Do you know that the moon was a great goddess in Old Egypt and that her name was lisis and-well, once I had to do with Isis? Perhaps you were there and knew it, since more lives than one are given tomost of us. I must search and learn. For the rest, all have not thought as you do Alex. Many, on the continue, have and seek to win the Date.

Now I hesitated, as what I had to tell her seems foolish, indeed so meane, while she waited patiently as the give me time to shape my thoughts. Speaking a because I must, I said,

'I come to ask you, Ayesha, to show me the dead, dead still live elsewhere'

Now I drew Zical's talesmen from it in the held it towards her.

'Give it to me,' she said.

I was about to obey when something seemed to wart the to do so.

'Nay,' I answered, he who lent the traction while, charged me that extent it contains the contains and others, I must wear it with and the state of the contains and the hand, saying that if I paried from the former would find the I believed none of this talk and the talk and the death drew near to me from a mare made and a mare and a wear about you, which doubless and the minutes in the if of another sort, Ayesha."

'Draw near,' she said. 'and in the first that the said in the said. So I rose from my chair and from the chair and from secretly that no one would see the which the most unsuspicious ever, that it proved to have compensations. Lates a financial the veil I saw her marvellous eyes tener that I have the before, and something of the pure curline of the latter with also the fragrance of her hair was wonderful

Yes, the wisdom of one whose years have borne him beyond the shafts that fly from woman's eyes, the ruinous shafts which bring men down to doom and nothingness. Tell me, Allan, is this the likeness of him who gave it you?'

'Yes, Ayesha, the very picture, as I think, carved by himself, though he said that it is ancient, and others tell that it has been known in the land for centuries."

'So perchance has he,' she answered drily, 'since some of our company live long. Now tell me this wizard's names. Nay, wait awhile for I would prove that indeed you are his messenger with whom I may talk about the dead, and other things, Allan. You can read Arabic, can you not?'

'A little,' I answered

Then from a stool at her side she took paper, or rather papyrus and a reed pen, and on her knee wrote something on the sheet which she gave to me folded up.

'Now tell me the names,' she said, 'and then let us see if they tally with what I have written, for if so you are a true man, not a mere wanderer or a spy.'

The principal names of this doctor are Zikali, the Opener-of-Roads, the "Thing-that-should-never-have-been-horn." I answered

'Read the writing, All in,' she said.

I unfolded the sheet and read Arabic words which meant, 'Weapons, Cleaver-of-Rocks, One-at-whom-dogs-bark-and-children-wail'

'The last two are near enough,' she said, 'but the first is'

wrong.'

'Nay, Ayesha, since in this man's tongue the word "Zikali" means "Weapons", intelligence at which she clapped her hands as a merry girl might do. 'The man,' I went on, 'k without doubt a great doctor, one who sees and knows thing that others do not, but I do not understand why this toker carved in his likeness should have power, as you say it has

'An oracle, the answer to a riddle, Ayesha.'

Then set it out another time. So you desire to see the ad, and this old dwarf, who is a home of wisdom, desires an acle from one who is greater than he. Good. And what e you, or both of you, prepared to pay for these boons? now, Allan, that I am a merchant who sell my favours dear. ill me then, will you pay?'

I think that it depends upon the price,' I answered

utiously. 'Set out the price, Ayesha.'

'Be not afraid, O cunning dealer,' she mocked. 'I do not k your soul or even that love of yours which you guard jealously, since these things I could take without the askg. Nav. I ask only what a brave and honest man may ve without shame: your help in war, and perhaps,' she added ith a softer tone, 'your friendship. I think, Allan, that I ke you well, perhaps because you remind me of another hom I knew long ago."

I bowed at the compliment, feeling proud and pleased at he prospect of a friendship with this wonderful and splendid reature, although I was aware that it had many dangers. then I sat still and waited. She also waited, brooding.

'Listen,' she said after a while, 'I will tell you a story and when you have heard it you shall answer, even if you do not believe it, but not before. Does it please you to listen to something of the tale of my life which I am moved to tell you, that you may know with whom you have to deal?'

Again I bowed, thinking to myself that I knew nothing that would please me more, who was eaten up with a devouring curiosity about this woman.

Now she rose from her couch and descending off the dais, began to walk up and down the chamber, I say, to walk, but her movements were more like the gliding of an eagle through the air or the motion of a swan upon still water, so smooth were they and gracious. As she walked she spoke in a low and thrilling voice.

'Listen,' she said again, 'and even if my story seems marvellous to you, interrupt, and above all, mock me not, lest I should grow angry, which might be ill for you. I am not as other women are, O Allan, who having conquered the secrets el Nature, here I felt an intense desire to ask what secrets but remembered and held my tongue, 'to my sorrow have preserved my youth and beauty through many ages. Moreover in the past, perhaps in payment for my sins, I have lived other lives of which some memory remains with me.

'By my last birth I am an Arab lady of royal blood, a descendant of the Kings of the East. There I dwelt in the wilderness and ruled a people, and at night I gathered wisdom from the stars and the spirits of the earth and air. At length I wearied of it all and my people too wearied of me and besought me to depart, for, Allan, I would have naught to do with men, yet men went mad because of my beauty and slew each other out of jealousy. Moreover other peoples made war upon my people, hoping to take me captive that I might be a wife to their kings. So I left them, and being furnished with great wealth in hoarded gold and jewels, together with a certain holy man, my master, I wandered through the world, studying the nations and their worships. At Jerusalem I tarried and learned of Jehovah who is, or was, its God.

'At Paphos in the Isle of Chitim I dwelt a while till the folk of that city thought that I was Aphrodite returned to earth and sought to worship me. For this reason and because I made a mock of Aphrodite, I, who, as I have said, would have naught to do with men, she through her priests cursed me, saying that her yoke should be more heavily upon my neck from age to age than on that of any woman who had breathed

It was a wondrous scene, she added reflectively, that of the cursing, since for every word I gave back two. Moreover I told the hoary villain of a high-priest to make report to his goddess that long after she was dead in the world, I would live on, for the spirit of prophecy was on me in that hour. Yet the curse fell in its season, since in her day, doubt it not, Aphrodite had strength, as indeed under other names she has and will have while the world endures, and for aught I know, beyond it. Do they worship her now in any land, Allan?

'No, only her statues because of their beauty, though Love...

'Yes, who can testify to that better than you yourself, Allan, if he who is called Zikali tells me the truth concerning you in the dreams he sends? As for the statues, I saw some of them as they left the master's hand in Greece, and when I told him that he might have found a better model, once I was that model. If this marble still endures, it must be the most famous of them all, though perchance Aphrodite has shattered it in her jealous rage. You shall tell me of these statues afterwards; mine had a mark on the left shoulder like to a mole, but the stone was imperfect, not my flesh, as I can prove if you should wish."

Thinking it better not to enter on a discussion as to

Ayesha's shoulder, I remained silent and she went on,

'I dwelt in Egypt also, and there, to be rid of men who wearied me with their sighs and importunities, also to acquire more wisdom of which she was the mistress, I entered the service of the goddess Isis, Queen of Heaven, vowing to remain virgin for ever. Soon I became her high-priestess and in her most sacred shrines upon the Nile, I communed with the goddess and shared her power, since from me her daughter, she withheld none of her secrets. So it came about that though Pharaohs held the sceptre, it was I who ruled Egypt and brought it and Sidon to their fall, it matters not how or why. as it was fated that I must do. Yes, kings would come to seek counsel from me where I sat throned, dressed in the garb of Isis and breathing out her power. Yet, my task accomplished. of it all I grew weary, as men will surely do of the heavens that they preach, should they chance to find them.'

I wondered what this 'task' might be, but only asked.

'Why?'

Because in their pictured heaven all things lie to their hands and man, being man, cannot be happy without struggle. and woman, being woman, without victory over others. What is cheaply bought, or given, has no value, Allan; to be enjoyed it must first be won. But I bade you not to break my thought."

I asked pardon and she went on.

Then it was that the shadow of the curse of Aphrodite fell upon me, yes, and of the curse of Isis also, so that these twin maledictions have made me what I am, a lost soul dwelling in the wilderness waiting the fulfilment of a fate whereof I know not the end. For though I have all wisdom, all knowledge of the Past and much power together with the gift of life and beauty, the future is as dark to me as night without its moon and stars.

Hearken, this chanced to me. Though it be to my shame I tell you that all may be clear. At a temple of Isis on the Nile where I ruled, there was a certain priest, a Greek by birth, vowed like myself to the service of the goddess and therefore to wed none but her, the goddess herself-that is, in the spirit. He was named Kallikrates, a man of courage and of heavily, such an one as those Greeks carved in the statues of their god Apollo. Never, I think, was a man more beautiful in face and form, though in soul he was not great, as often happens to men who have all else, and well-nigh always happens to women, save myself and perhaps one or two others that history tells of, doubtless magnifying their fabled charms.

The Pharaoh of that day, the last of the native blood, him whom the Persians drove to doom, had a daughter, the Princess of Egypt, Amenartas by name, a fair woman in her fashion, though somewhat swarthy. In her youth this Amenartas became enamoured of Kallikrates and he of her, when he was a captain of the Grecian Mercenaries at Pharaoh's Court, Indeed, she brought blood upon his hands because of her, wherefore he fled to Isis for forgiveness and for peace. Thither in after time she followed him and again urged her love.

Learning of the thing and knowing it for sacrilege, I summoned this priest and warned him of his danger and of the doom which awaited him should be continue in that path. He grew affrighted. He flung himself upon the ground before me with groans and supplications, and kissing my feet, yowed most falsely to me that his dealings with the royal Amenartas were but a veil and that it was I whom he worshipped. His unhallowed words filled me with horror and sternly I bade him begone and do penance for his crime, saying that I would pray the goddess on behalf of him.

He went, leaving me alone lost in thought in the darkening shrine. Then sleep fell on me and in my sleep I dreamed a dream, or saw a vision. For suddenly there stood before me a woman beauteous as myself clad in nothing save a golden girdle and a veil of gossamer.

"O Ayesha," she said in a honeyed voice, "priestess of Isis of the Egyptians, sworn to the barren worship of Isis and fed on the ashes of her unprofitable wisdom, know that I am Aphrodite of the Greeks whom many times thou hast mocked and defied, and Queen of the breathing world, as Isis is Queen of the world that is dead. Now because thou didst despise me and pour contempt upon my name, I smite thee with my strength and lay a curse upon thee. It is that thou shalt love and desire this man who but now hath kissed thy feet, ever longing till the world's end to kiss his lips in payment, although thou art as far above him as the moon thou servest is above the Nile. Think not that thou shalt escape my doom, for know that however strong the spirit, here upon the earth the flesh is stronger still and of all flesh I am the queen."

Then she laughed softly and smiting me across the eves with a lock of her scented hair, was gone.

'Allan, I awoke from my sleep and a great trouble fell upon me, for I who had never loved before now was rent with a rage of love and for this man who till that moment had been naught to me but as some beauteous image of gold and ivory. I longed for him, my heart was racked with jealousy because of the Egyptian who favoured him, an eating flame possessed my breast. I grew mad. There in the shrine of Isis the divine I cast myself upon my knees and cried to Aphrodite to return and give me him I sought, for whose sake I would renounce all else, even if I must pour my wisdom into a beauteous. empty cup. Yes, thus I prayed and lay upon the ground and went until, outworn, once more sleep fell upon me.

'Now in the darkness of the holy place once more there came a dream or vision, since before me in her glory stood the goddess Isis crowned with the Crescent of the young moon and holding in her hand the jewelled sistrum that is her symbol, from which came music like to the melody of distant bells. She gazed at me and in her great eyes were scorn and anger.

"O Ayesha, Daughter of Wisdom," she said in a solemn voice, "whom I, Isis, had come to look upon rather as a child than a servant, since in none other of my priestesses was such greatness to be found, and whom in a day to be I had purposed to raise to the very steps of my heavenly throne. thou hast broken thine oath and, forsaking me, hast worshipped false Aphrodite of the Greeks who is mine enemy. Yea, in the eternal war between the spirit and the flesh, thou hast chosen the part of flesh. Therefore I hate thee and add my doom to that which Aphrodite laid upon thee, which, hadst thou prayed to me and not to her, I would have lifted from thy heart.

"Hearken! The Grecian whom thou hast chosen, by Aphrodite's will, thou shalt love as the Pathian said. More, thy love shall bring his blood upon thy hands, nor mayest thou follow him to the grave. For I will show thee the Source of Life and thou shalt drink of it to make thyself more fair even than thou art and thus outpace thy rival, and when thy lover is dead, in a desolate place thou shalt wait in grief and solitude till he be born again and find thee there.

"Yet shall this be but the beginning of thy sorrows, since through all time thou shalt pursue thy fate till at length thou canst draw up this man to the height on which thine own soul stands by the ropes of love and loss and suffering. Moreover . through it all thou shalt despise thyself, which is man's and woman's hardest lot, thou who having the rare feast of spirit pread out before thee, hast chosen to fill thyself from the roughs of flesh." 'Then, Allan, in my dream I made a proud answer to the oddess, saying, "Hear me, mighty mistress of many Forms who dost appear in all that lives! An evil fate has fallen mon me, but was it I who chose that fate? Can the leaf contend against the driving gale? Can the falling stone turn mwards to the sky, or when Nature draws it, can the tide cease to flow? A goddess whom I have offended, that goddess whose strength causes the whole world to be, has laid her curse upon me and because I have bent before the storm, as bend I must, or break, another goddess whom I serve, thou thyself. Mother Isis, hast added to the curse. Where then is Justice, O Lady of the Moon "

"Not here. Woman," she answered, "Yet far away Justice lives and shall be won at last and mayhap because thou art so proud and high-stomached, it is laid upon thee to seek her blinded eyes through many an age. Yet at last I think thou shalt set thy sins against her weights and find the balance even Therefore cease from questioning the high decrees of destiny which thou canst not understand and be content to suffer, remembering that all joy grows from the root of pain. Moreover, know this for the comfort, that the wisdom which thou hast shall grow and gather on thee and with it thy beauty and thy power, also that at the last thou shalt look upon my face again, in token whereof I leave to thee my symbol, the sistrum that I bear, and with it this command. Follow that false priest of mine wherever he may go and avenge me upon him, and if thou lose him there, wait while the generations pass till he return again Such and no other is thy destiny."

'Allan, the vision faded and when I awoke the lights of dawn played upon the image of the goddess in the sanctuary. They played, moreover, upon the holy jewelled thing that in my dream her hand had held, the sistrum of her worship, shaped like the loop of life, the magic symbol that she had vowed to me, wherewith goes her power, which henceforth was mine.

'I took it and followed after the priest Kallikrates, to whom thenceforward I was bound by passion's ties that are stronger than all the goddesses in this wide universe.'

Here I, Allan, could contain myself no longer and asked

'What for?' then, fearing her wrath, wished that I had been silent.

But she was not angry, perhaps because this tale of her interviews with goddesses, doubtless fabled, had made her humble, for she answered quietly,

'By Aphrodite, or by Isis, or both of them I did not know. All I knew was that I must seek him, then and evermore, as seek I do to-day and shall perchance through aeons yet unborn. So I followed, as I was taught and commanded, the sistrum being my guide, how it matters not, and giving me the means, and so at last I came to this ancient land whereof the ruin in which you sit was once known as Kôr.'

ALLAN MISSES OPPORTUNITY

ALL the while that she was talking thus the Lady or the Queen or the Witch-woman, Ayesha, had been walking up and down the place from the curtains to the foot of the dais, sweeping me with her scented robes as she passed to and fro, and as she walked she waved her arms as an orator might do to emphasise the more moving passages of her tale. Now at the end of it, or what I took to be the end, she stepped on to the dais and sank upon the couch as if exhausted, though I think her spirit was weary rather than her body.

Here she sat awhile, brooding, her chin resting on her hand, then suddenly looked up and fixing her glance upon me—for I could see the flash of it through her thin veil—said,

'What think you of this story, Allan? Do you believe it and have you ever heard its like?'

Never. I answered with emphasis, and of course I believe every word. Only there are one or two questions that with your leave I would wish to ask. Avesha.

By which you mean. Allan, that you believe nothing, being by nature without faith and doubtful of all that you cannot see and touch and handle. Well, perhaps you are wise, since what I have told you is not all the truth. For example, it comes back to me now that it was not in the temple on the Nile, or indeed upon the Earth, that I saw the vision of Aphrodite and of Isis, but elsewhere: also that it was here in Kôr that I was first consumed by passion for Kallikrates whom hitherto I had scorned in two thousand years one forgets much, Allan Out with your questions and I will answer them, unless they be too long.

'Ayesha,' I said humbly reflecting to myself that my questions would, at any rate, be shorter than her varying tale, 'even I who am not learned have heard of these goddesses of whom you speak, of the Grecian Aphrodite who rose from the sea upon the shores of Cyprus and dwelt at Paphos and elsewhere—'

'Yes, doubtless like most men you have heard of her and perchance also have been struck across the eves with the thank like your betters before you, she interrupted with services.

"-Also," I went on, avoiding argument, I have here of Isis of the Egyptians, Lady of the Moon, Morre of the teries. Spouse of Osiris whose child was Horus the Areas

'Aye, and I think will hear more of her before yes are done, Allan, for now something comes back to me occess & you and her and another. I am not the only one was the broken the oaths of Isis and received her curse. Alise, as you may find out in the days to come. But what of the heavenly queens?'

Only this, Ayesha; I have been taught that they were been phantasms fabled by men with many another faise divinity. and could have sworn that this was true. And yet you take of them as real and living, which perplexes me.

Being dull of understanding doubtless it perplexes you. an. Yet if you had imagination you might understand t these goddesses are great Principles of Nature: Isis, of oned Wisdom and strait virtue, and Aphrodite, of Love, as s known to men and women who, being human, have it laid on them that they must hand on the torch of Life in their tle hour. Also you would know that such Principles can em to take shape and form and at certain ages of the world pear to their servants visible in majesty, though perchance day others with changed names wield their sceptres and ork their will. Now you are answered on this matter. So the next.'

Privately I did not feel as though I were answered at all nd I was sure that I knew nothing of the kind she indicated, ut thinking it best to leave the subject, I went on,

'If I understood rightly, Ayesha, the events which you have een pleased first to describe to me, and then to qualify or ontradict, took place when the Pharaohs reigned. Now no Pharaoh has sat upon the throne of Egypt for near two thousand years, for the last was a Grecian woman whom the Romans conquered and drove to death. And yet, Ayesha, you speak as though you had lived all through that gulf of time, and in this there must be error, because it is impossible. Therefore I suppose you to mean that this history has come down to you in writing, or perhaps in dreams. I believe that even in such far-off times there were writers of romance, and we all know of what stuff dreams are made. At least this thought comes to me, I added hurriedly, fearing lest I had said too much, and one so wise as you are, I repeat, knows well that a woman who says she has lived two thousand years must be mad or—suffer from delusions, because I repeat, it is impossible.

At these quite innocent remarks she sprang to her feet in a rage that might truly be called royal in every sense.

'Impossible! Romance! Dreams! Delusions! Mad!' she cried in a ringing voice. 'Oh! of a truth you weary me, and I have a mind to send you whither you will learn what is impossible and what is not. Indeed, I would do it, and now, only I need your services, and if I did there would be none left for me to talk with, since your companion is moonstruck and the others are but savages of whom I have seen enough.

'Hearken, fool! Nothing is impossible. Why do you seek, you who talk of the impossible, to girdle the great world in the span of your two hands and to weigh the secrets of the Universe in the balance of your petty mind and, of that which you cannot understand, to say that it is not? Life you admit, because you see it all about you But that it should endure for two thousand years, which after all is but a second's beat in the story of the earth, that to you is "impossible," although in truth the buried seed or the sealed-up toad can live as long. Doubtless, also, you have some faith which promises you this same boon to all eternity, after the little change called Death.

Nay, Allan it is possible enough, like to many other things of which you do not dream to-day that will be common to the eyes of those who follow after you. Mayhap you think it impossible that I should speak with and learn of you from yonder old black wizard who dwells in the country whence you came. And yet whenever I will I do so in the night because he is in tune with me, and what I do shall be done by all men in the years unborn. Yes, they shall talk together across the wide spaces of the earth, and the lover shall hear her lover's voice although great seas roll between them. Nor perchance will it stop at this; perchance in future time men shall hold converse with denizens of the stars, and even with the dead who have passed into silence and the darkness. Do you hear and understand me?

'Yes, yes,' I answered feebly.

You lie, as you are too prone to do. You hear but you do not understand nor believe, and oh! you vex me sorely. Now I had it in my mind to tell you the secret of this long life of mine; long, mark you, but not endless, for doubtless I must die and change and return again, like others, and even to show you how it may be won. But you are not worthy in your faithlessness.

'No, no. I am not worthy.' I answered, who at that moment did not feel the least desire to live two thousand years, perhaps with this woman as a neighbour, rating me from generation to generation. Yet it is true, that now when I am older and a certain event cannot be postponed much longer. I do often regret that I neglected to take this unique chance, if in truth there was one, of prolonging an existence which after all has its consolations—especially when one has made one's pile. Certainly it is a case, a flagrant case, of neglected opportunities, and my only consolation for having lost them is that this was due to the uprightness of my nature which made it so hard for me to acquiesce in alternative statements that I had every cause to disbelieve and thus to give offence to a very powerful and perulant if amaguve lady.

'So that is done with she went on with a little stamp of indignation, as soon you will be also, who, had you not crossed and doubted me, mixin have lived on for untold time at

be with his master like a dog and to satisfy at once his stomach and his apish curiosity. You, Allan, shall see those dead over whom you brood at night, though the other guerdon that you might have won is now passed from your reach because you mock me in your heart.'

'What must we do to gain these things?' I asked. 'How can we humble creatures help one who is all powerful and who has gathered in her breast the infinite knowledge of two thousand years?'

'You must make war under my banner and rid me of my foes. As for the reason, listen to the end of my tale and you shall learn.'

I reflected that it was a marvellous thing that this queen ; who claimed supernatural powers should need our help in a war, but thinking it wiser to keep my meditations to myself, said nothing. As a matter of fact I might just as well have spoken, since as usual she read my thoughts.

You are thinking that it is strange. Allan, that I, the Mighty and Undying, should seek your aid in some petty tribal battle, and so it would be were my foes but common savages. But they are more, they are men protected by the ancient god of this immemorial city of Kôr, a great god in his day whose spirit still haunts these ruins and whose strength still protects the worshippers who cling to him and practise his unholy rites of human sacrifice.

'How was this god named' I asked.

Retu was his name, and from him came the Egyptian Re or Ra, since in the beginning Kôr was the mother of Egypt and the conquering people of Kôr took their god with them when they burst into the valley of the Nile and subdued its peoples long before the first Pharaoh. Menes, wore Egypt's crown.

'Ra was the sun, was he not?' I asked

'Aye, and Rezu also was a sun-god who from his throne in the fires of the Lord of Day, gave life to men, or slew them if he willed with his thunderbolts of drought and pestilence and storm. He was no gentle king of heaven, but one who demanded blood-sacrifice from his worshippers, yes, even that of maids and children. So it came about that the people of Kôr, who saw their virgins slain and eaten by the priests of Rezu, and their infants burned to ashes in the fires that his ays lit, turned themselves to the worship of the gentle moon, he goddess whom they named Lulala, while some of them those Truth for their queen, since Truth, they said, was greater and more to be desired than the fierce Sun-King or even the sweet Moon-Lady, Truth, who sat above them both throned in the furthest stars of Heaven. Then the demon, Rezu, grew wroth and sent a pestilence upon Kôr and its subject lands and slew their people, save those who clung to him in the great apostasy, and with them some others who served Lulala and Truth the Divine, that escaped I know not how.

'Did you see this great pestilence?' I asked, much interested. 'Nay, it besell generations before I came to Kôr. One Junis, a priest, wrote a record of it in the caves yonder where I have my home and where is the burying-place of the countless thousands that it slew. In my day Kôr, of which, should you desire to hear it, I will tell you the history, was a ruin as it is now, though scattered in the lands about amidst the tumbled stones which once built up her subject cities, a people named the Amahagger dwelt in Households or Tribes and there sacrificed men by fire and devoured them, following the rites of the demon Rezu. For these were the descendants of those who escaped the pestilence. Also there were certain others, children of the worshippers of Lulaia whose kingdom is the moon, and of Truth the Queen, who clung to the gentle worship of their forefathers and were ever at war with the followers of Rezu.'

'What brought you to Kôr Ayesha?' I asked irrelevantly. 'Have I not said that I was led hither by the command and the symbol of great Isis whom I serve? Also,' she added after a pause, 'that I might find a certain pair, one of whom had broken his oaths to her, tempted thereto by the other.'

'And did you find them, Ayesha?' I asked.

'Aye. I found them, or rather they found me, and in my presence the goddess executed her decree upon her false priest and drove his temptress back to the world.

'That must have been dreadful for you, Ayesha, since I understood that you also-liked this priest."

She sprang from her couch and in a low, hissing voice which resembled the sound made by an angry snake and turned my blood cold to hear, exclaimed,

'Man, do you dare to mock me? Nay, you are but a blundering, curious fool, and it is well for you that this is so, since otherwise like Kallikrates, never should you leave Kôr living. Cease from seeking that which you may not learn. Suffice it for you to know that the doom of Isis fell upon the lad Kallikrates, her priest forsworn, and that on me also fell

her doom, who must dwell here, dead yet living, till he return again and the play begins afresh.

'Stranger,' she went on in a softer voice, 'perchance your faith, whate'er it be, parades a hell to terrify its worshippers and give strength to the arms of its prophesying priests, who swear they hold the keys of doom or of the eternal joys. I see you sign assent' (I had nodded at her extremely accurate guess) 'and therefore can understand that in such a hell as this, here upon the earth I have dwelt for some two thousand years, expiating the crime of Powers above me whercof I am but the hand and instrument, since those Powers which decreed that I should love, decree also that I must avenge that love.'

She sank down upon the couch as though exhausted by emotion, of which I could only guess the reasons, hiding her face in her hands. Presently she let them fall again and continued.

'Of these woes ask me no more. They sleep till the hour of their resurrection, which I think draws nigh; indeed, I thought that you, perchance—But let that be. 'Twas near the mark; nearer, Allan, than you know, not in it! Therefore leave them to their sleep as I would if I might-ah! if I might, whose companions they are throughout the weary ages. Alas! that through the secret which was revealed to me I remain undying on the earth who in death might perhaps have found a rest, and being human although half divine. must still busy myself with the affairs of earth.

Look you. Wanderer, after that which was fated had happened and I remained in my agony of solitude and sorrow. after, too. I had drunk of the cup of enduring life and like the Prometheus of old fable, found myself bound to this changeless rock, whereon day by day the vultures of remorse tear. out my living heart which in the watches of the night is ever doomed to grow again within my woman's breast, I was plunged into petty troubles of the flesh, ave and welcomed them because their irk at times gave me forgetfulness: When the savage dwellers in this land came to know that a mighty one had risen among them who was the servant of the Lady of the Moon, those of them who still worshipped their goddess Lulala, gathered themselves about me, while those of them who worshipped Rezu sought to overthrow me.

"Here," they said. "is the goddess Lulala come to earth. In the name of Rezu let us slay her and make an end," for these fools thought that I could be killed. Allan, I conquered them, but their captain, who is also named Rezu and whom they held and hold to be an emanation of the god himself walking the earth, I could not conquer.'

'Why not?' I asked.

'For this reason, Allan. In some past age his god showed him the same secret that was shown to me. He too had drunk of the Cup of Life and lives on unharmed by Time, so that being in strength my equal, no spear of mine can reach his heart clad in the armour of his evil god.'

'Then what spear can?' I inquired helplessly, who was bewildered.

'None at all. Allan, yet an axe may, as you shall hear, or so I think. For many generations there has been peace of a sort between the worshippers of Lulala who dwell with me in the Plain of Kôr, or rather of myself, since to these people I am Lulala, and the worshippers of Rezu, who dwell in the strongholds beyond the mountain crest. But of late years their chief Rezu, having devastated the lands about, has grown restless and threatened attack on Kôr, which is not strong enough to stand against him. Moreover he has sought for a white queen to rule under him, purposing to set her up mock my majesty.'

ls that why those cannibals carried away the daughter my companion, the Sea-Captain who is named Avenger?'

It is, Allan, since presently he will give it out that I am id or fled, if he has not done so already, and that this w queen has arisen in my place. Thereby he hopes to draw ay many who cling to me ere he advances upon Kôr, carrywith him this girl veiled as I am, so that none may know difference between us, since not a man of them has ever sked upon my face, Allan. Therefore this Rezu must die. die he can; otherwise, although it is impossible that he ould harm me, he may slay or draw away my people and we them with none to rule in this place where by the decree Fate I must dwell on until he whom I seek returns. You are inking in your heart that such savages would be little loss id this is so, but still they serve as slaves to me in my loneliiss. Moreover I have sworn to protect them from the demon ezu and they have trusted in me and therefore my honour at stake, for never shall it be said that those who trusted in ne-who-commands, were overthrown because they put faith one who was powerless.'

'What do you mean about an axe, Ayesha!' I asked. 'Why an an axe alone kill Rezu?'

'The thing is a mystery, O Allan, of which I may not tell you all, since to do so I must reveal secrets which I have determined you shall not learn. Suffice it to you to know that when this Rezu drank of the Cup of Life, he took with him his axe. Now this axe was an ancient weapon rumoured to have been fashioned by the gods and, as it chanced, that axe drew to itself more and stronger life than did Rezu, how, it does not matter, if indeed the tale be more than a fable. At least this I know is true, for he who guarded the Gate of Life, a certain Noot, a master of mysteries, and mine also in my day of youth, who, being a philosopher and very wise, chose never to pass that portal which was open to him, said it to me himself ere he went the way of flesh. He told this Rezu also that now he had naught to fear save his own axe and therefore he counselled him to guard it well, since if it was lifted against him in another's hands it would bring him down to death, which nothing else could do Like to the heel of Achilles whereof the great Homer sings-have you read Homer, Allan?'

'In a translation,' I answered.

'Good, then you will remember the story. Like to the heel of Achilles, I say, that axe would be the only gate by which death could enter his invulnerable flesh, or rather it alone could make the gate.'

'How did Noot know that?' I asked.

I cannot say, she answered with irritation. Perchance he did not know it Perchance it is all an idle tale, but at least it is true that Rezu believed and believes it, and what a man believes is true for him and will certainly befall. If it were otherwise, what is the use of faith which in a thousand forms supports our race and holds it from the horrors of the Pit? Only those who believe nothing inherit what they believe—nothing, Allan.

'It may be so.' I replied prosaically, 'but what happened about the ave?'

'In the end it was lost, or as some say stolen by a woman whom Rezu had deserted, and therefore he walks the world in fear from day to day. Nay, ask no more empty questions' (I had opened my mouth to speak) 'but hear the end of the tale. In my trouble concerning Rezu 1 remembered this wild legend of the axe and since, when lost in a forest every path that may lead to safety should be explored, I sent my wisdom forth to make inquiry concerning it, as I who am great, have the power to do, of certain who are in tune with me throughout this wide land of Africa. Amongst others, I inquired of that old wizard whom you name Zikali. Opener of Roads, and he gave me answer that there lived in his land a certain warmer who ruled a tribe called the People of the Axe by right of the Axe, of which axe none, not even he, knew the beginning of the legend. On the chance, though it was a small one. I hade the wizard send that warrior here with his axe. Last night he stood before me and I looked upon him and the axe, which at least is ancient and has a story. Whether it he the same that Rezu bore I do not know who never saw in yet permitted he who bears it now is prepared to hold it aloft in hamle even against Rezu, though he be terrible to see, and then we shall learn.'

'Oh! yes,' I answered, the is quite prepared for the his nature. Also among this man's people, the holder of the Axe is thought to be unconquerable.

'Yet some must have been conquered who had in the replied musingly. 'Well, you shall tell me that mie late. Why we have talked long and you are weary and assurabled Goleat and rest yourself. ROBERTSON IS LOST

So I went and was conducted by Billali, the old chamberlain, for such seemed to be his office, who had been waiting patiently without all this while, back to our rest-house. On my way I picked up Hans, whom I found sitting outside the arch, and found that as usual that worthy had been keeping his eyes and ears open

'Baas,' he said, 'did the White Witch tell you that there is a big impi encamped over yonder outside the houses, in what looks like a great dry ditch, and on the edge of the plain beyond?

'No. Hans, but she said that this evening she would show us those in whose company we must fight."

Well, Baas, they are there, some thousands of them, for I crept through the broken walls like a snake and saw them. And, Baas, I do not think they are men, I think that they are evil spirits who walk at night only.

'Why, Hans?'

'Because when the sun is high. Baas, as it is now, they are all sleeping. Yes, there they lie abed, fast asleep, as other people do at night, with only a few sentries out on guard, and these are yawning and rubbing their eyes.'

I have heard that there are tolk like that in the middle of Africa where the sun is very hot. Hans, I answered, 'which perhaps is why She-who-commands is going to take us to see them at night. Also these people, it seems, are worshippers of the moon.

'No, Baas, they are worshippers of the devil and that White Witch is his wife.'

You had better keep your thoughts to yourself, Hans, for whatever she is I think that she can read thoughts from far away, as you guessed last night. Therefore I would not have any if I were you.

'No, Baas, or if I must think, henceforth, it shall be only of gin which in this place is also far away,' he replied, grinning. Then we came to the rest-house where I found that Robert-fight we must, so there was nothing more to be said. Also without doubt this adventure was particularly interesting and I could only hope that good luck, or Zikali's Great Medicine, or rather Providence, would see me through it safety.

For the rest the fact that our help was necessary to her this war-like venture showed me clearly enough that all s wonderful woman's pretensions to supernatural powers are the sheerest nonsense. Had they been otherwise the ould not have needed our help in her tribal fights, netwith-inding the rubbish she talked about the chief, Rezu, who cording to her account of him, must resemble one of the bulous 'trolls,' half-human and half-ghostly evil creatures, whom I have read in the Norse Sagas, who could only be in by some particular hero armed with a particular weapon.

Reflecting thus I went to sleep and did not wake until the n was setting. Finding that Hans was also sleeping at y feet just like a faithful dog. I woke him up and we went ck together to the rest-house, which we reached as the darkss fell with extraordinary swiftness, as it does in those litudes, especially in a place surrounded by cliffs.

Not finding Robertson in the house. I concluded that he is somewhere outside, possibly making a reconnaissance on s own account, and told Hans to get supper ready for both us. While he was doing so, by aid of the Amahagger mps, Umslopogaas suddenly appeared in the circle of light, ad looking about him, said.

'Where is Red-Beard, Macumazahn?'

I answered that I did not know and waited, for I felt sure at he had something to say.

'I think that you had better keep Red-Beard close to you, lacumazahn,' he went on. 'This afternoon, when you had sturned from visiting the white doctoress and having eaten, ad gone to sleep under the wall yonder, I saw Red-Beard ome out of the house carrying a gun and a bag of cartridges, lis eyes rolled wildly and he turned first this way and then hat, snifling at the air, like a buck that scents danger. Then e began to talk aloud in his own tongue and as I saw that was speaking with his Spirit, as those do who are mad,

'Why?' I asked.

went away and left him.'

Because, as you know, Macumazahn, it is a law a Zulus never to disturb one who is mad and en alking with his Spirit. Moreover, had I done so, he would have shot me, nor should I have complained who would have thrust myself in where I had no right to be."

"Then why did you not come to call me. Umslopogaas?"

'Because then he might have shot you, for, as I have seen for some time he is inspired of heaven and knows not what he does upon the earth, thinking only of the Lady Sad-Eyes who has been stolen away from him, as is but natural. So I left him walking up and down, and when I returned later to look, saw that he was gone, as I thought into this walled hut. Now when Hansi tells me that he is not here, I have come to speak to you about him.'

'No, certainly he is not here,' I said, and I went to look at the bed where Robertson slept to see if it had been used that evening.

Then for the first time I saw lying on it a piece of paper torn from a pocketbook and addressed to myself. I seized and read it. It ran thus:

'The merciful Lord has sent me a vision of Inez and shown me where she is over the cliff-edge away to the west, also the road to her. In my sleep I heard her talking to me. She told me that she is in great danger—that they are going to marry her to some brute—and called to me to come at once and save her; yes, and to come alone without saying anything to anyone. So I am going at once. Don't be frightened or trouble about me. All will be well, all will be quite well. I will tell you the rest when we meet.'

Horrorstruck I translated this insane screed to Umslopo-gaas and Hans. The former nodded gravely.

'Did I not tell you that he was talking with his Spirit, Macumazahn?' (I had rendered 'the merciful Lord' as the Good Spirit.) 'Well, he has gone and doubtless his Spirit will take care of him. It is finished.'

'At any rate we cannot. Baas,' broke in Hans, who I think feared that I might send him out to look for Robertson.' I can follow most spoors, but not on such a night as this when one could cut the blackness into lumps and build a wall of it.'

'Yes,' I answered, 'he has gone and nothing can be done at present,' though to myself I reflected that probably he had not gone far and would be found when the moon rose, or at any rate on the following morning.

... Still I was most uneasy about the man who, as I had noted for a long while, was losing his balance more and more. The shock of the barbarous and dreadful slaughter of his half-

After a swift glance at them, as I guessed by the motion of her veiled head, she seemed to fix her gaze upon my pipe that evidently excited her curiosity, and asked me what it was. I explained as well as I could, expatiating on the charms of smoking.

'So men have learned another useless vice since I left theworld, and one that is filthy also, she said, sniffing at the smoke and waving her hand before her face, whereon I dropped the pipe into my pocket, where, being alight, it burnt a hole in my best remaining coat.

I remember the remark because it showed me what a clever actress she was who, to keep up her character of antiquity, pretended to be astonished at a habit with which she must have been well acquainted, although I believe that it was unknown in the ancient world

'You are troubled,' she went on, swiftly changing the subject, 'I read it in your face. One of your company is missing. Who is it? Ah! I see, the white man you name Avenger. Where is he gone?'

'That is what I wish to ask you, Ayesha,' I said.

'How can I tell you. Allan, who in this place lack any glass into which to look for things that pass afar. Still, let me try,' and pressing her hands to her forehead, she remained silent for perhaps a minute, then spoke slowly.

'I think that he has gone over the mountain lip towards the worshippers of Rezu. I think that he is mad; sorrow and something else which I do not understand have turned his brain; something that has to do with the Heavens. I think also that we shall recover him living, if only for a little while, though of this I cannot be sure since it is not given to me to read the future, but only the past, and sometimes the things that happen in the present though they be far away.'

'Will you send to search for him, O Ayesha?' I asked anxiously.

'Nay, it is useless, for he is already distant. Moreover those who went might be taken by the outposts of Rezu, as perchance has happened to your companion wandering in his madness. Do you know what he went to seek?'

'More or less,' I answered and translated to her the letter that Robertson had left for me.

'It may be as the man writes, she commented, 'since the mad often see well in their dreams, though these are not sent by a god as he imagines. attached by the leather thoug.

Does the Black One think that I shall cut him down with his own weapon, I who am so weak and gentle?" she asked, laughing.

has strength to breach the wall of blackness that is b between me and her who is "gone down."

'Strange,' reflected Ayesha when she understood, 'that I grim Destroyer should yet be bound by the silken bonds love and yearn for one whom the grave has taken. Le from it, Allan, that all humanity is cast in the same mor since my longings and your longings are his also, though three of us be far apart as are the sun and the moon and earth, and as different in every other quality. Yet it is t that sun and moon and earth are born of the same bla womb of chaos. Therefore in the beginning they were identic as doubtless they will be in the end when, their journevin done, they rush together to light space with a flame at wh the mocking gods that made them may warm their han Well, so it is with men, Allan, whose soul-stuff is dra from the gulf of Spirit by Nature's hand, and, cast upon : cold air of this death-driven world, freezes into a milli shapes each different to the other and yet, be sure, the sar Now talk no more, but follow me. Slave (this was address to Billali), bid the guards lead on to the camp of the serva of Lulala.

So we went through the silent ruins. Ayesha walked, rather glided a pace or two ahead, then came Umslopoga and I side by side, while at our heels followed Hans, we close at our heels, since he did not wish to be out of rea of the virtue of the Great Medicine and incidentally of 1 protection of axe and rifle.

Thus we marched surrounded by the solemn guard I something between a quarter and half a mile, till at leng we climbed the debris of a mighty wall that once had encorpassed the city, and by the moonlight saw beneath us a vihollow which clearly at some unknown time had been the b of an enormous moat and filled with water.

Now, however, it was dry and all about its surface we dotted numerous camp-fires round which men were movir also some women who appeared to be engaged in cóoki food. At a little distance too, upon the further edge of t moat-like depression were a number of white-robed individue gathered in a circle about a large stone upon which somethis was stretched that resembled the carcase of a sheep or got and round these a great number of spectators.

'The priests of Lulala who make sacrifice to the moon, as they do night by night, save when she is dead,' said

Ayesha, turning back towards me as though in answer to the query which I had conceived but left unuttered.

What struck me about the whole scene was its extraordinary animation and briskness. All the folk round the fires and outside of them moved about quickly and with the same kind of liveliness which might animate a camp of more natural people at the rising of the sun. It was as though they had just got up full of vigour to commence their daily, or rather their nightly round, which in truth was the case, since as Hans had discovered, by habitude these Amahagger preferred to sleep during the day unless something prevented them, and to carry on the activities of life at night. It only remains to add that there seemed to be a great number of them, for their fires following the round of the dry moat, stretched further than I could see.

Scrambling down the crumbled wall by a zig-zag pathway. came upon the outposts of the army beneath us who llenged, then seeing with whom they had to do, fell flat on their faces, leaving their great spears, which had iron kes on their shafts like to those of the Masai, sticking in the und beside them.

We passed on between some of the fires and I noted how emn and gloomy, although handsome, were the countenes of the folk by whom these were surrounded. Indeed, y looked like denizens of a different world to ours, one alien the kindly race of men. There was nothing social about se Amahagger, who seemed to be a people labouring under ne ancient ancestral curse of which they could never shake the memory. Even the women rarely smiled: their cleart, stately countenances remained stern and set, except when ly glowered at us incuriously. Only when Ayesha passed ly prostrated themselves like the rest.

We went on through them and across the most, climbing further slope and here suddenly came upon a host of men thered in a hollow square, apparently in order to receive . They stood in ranks of five or six deep and their spearsints glimmering in the moonlight looked like long bands of vel steel. As we entered the open side of the square all these wars were lifted. Thrice they were lifted and at each upfling there rose a deep-throated cry of High, which is the mble for She, and I suppose was a calculation to Ayesta.

She swept on taking to Reed. Ill we came to the centre of he square where a momber of men were gathered which privatrated themselves in the usual fashion. Motioning to them.

to rise she said,

'Captains, this very night within two hours we march against Rezu and the sun-worshippers, since otherwise as my arts tell me, they march against us. She-who-commands is immortal, as your fathers have known from generation to generation, and cannot be destroyed; but you, her servants, can be destroyed, and Rezu, who also has drunk of the Cup of Life, out-numbers you by three to one and prepares a queen to set up in my place over his own people and such of you as remain. As though,' she added with a contemptuous laugh. 'any woman of a day could take my place.'

She paused and the spokesman of the captains said,

We hear, O Hiya, and we understand What wouldest thot have us do, O Lulala-come-to-earth? The armies of Rezu are great and from the beginning he has hated thee and us also his magic is as thy magic and his length of days as thy length of days. How then can we who are few, three thousand men at the most, match ourselves against Rezu Son of the Sun? Would it not be better that we should accept the terms of Rezu, which are light, and acknowledge him as our king?

As she heard these words I saw tho tall shape of Ayesha quiver beneath her robes, as I think, not with fear but with rage, because the meaning of them was clear enough, namely that rather than risk a battle with Rezu, these people were contemplating suirender and her own deposition, if indeed she could be deposed. Still she answered in a quiet voice,

It seems that I have dealt too gently with you and with your fathers. Children of Lulala, whose shadow I am here upon the earth, so that because you only see the scabbard you have forgotten the sword within and that it can shint forth and smite Well, why should I be wrath because the brutish will follow the law of brutes, though it is true that am minded to slay you where you stand? Hearken! Were less merciful I would leave you to the clutching hands of Rezu who would drag you one by one to the stone of sacrifice and offer up your hearts to his god of fire and devour your bodies with his heat. But I bethink me of your wives and childrer and of your forefathers whom I knew in the dead days; and therefore, if I may, I still would save you from yourselves and your heads from the glowing pot.

'Take counsel together now and say—Will you fight again Rezu, or will you yield? If that is your desire, speak it, and by to-morrow's sun I will begone, taking these with me, and she pointed to us, 'whom I have summoned to help us in the war. Aye, I will begone, and when you are stretched upon the stone of sacrifice, and your women and children are the slaves of the men of Rezu, then shall you cry,

"Oh, where is Hiya whom our fathers knew? Oh, wil

she not return and save us from this hell?"

Yes, so shall you cry but there shall come no answer, since n she will have departed to her own habitations in the on and thence appear no more. Now consult together and wer swiftly, since I weary of you and your ways.'

The captains drew apart and began to talk in low voices ile Ayesha stood still, apparently quite unconcerned, and

t was obvious to me that these people were almost in ellion against their strange ruler, whose power over them s of a purely moral nature, one that emanated from her sonality alone. What I wondered was, being what she med to be, why she thought it worth while to exercise i all. Then I remembered her statement that here and no ere else she must abide for some secret reason, until a tain mystical gentleman with a Greek name came to fetch away from this appointed rendezvous. Therefore I supsed she had no choice, or rather, suffering as she did from lucinations, believed herself to have no choice and was liged to put up with a crowd of disagreeable savages in arters which were sadly out of repair.

Presently the spokesman returned, saluted with his spear

i asked,

If we go up to fight against Rezu who will lead us in the ttle, O Hiya?

My wisdom shall be your guide, she answered, 'this white in shall be your General and there stands the warrior who all meet Rezu face to face and bring him to the dust,' and pointed to Umslopogaas leaning upon his axe and watchthem with a contemptuous smile.

This reply did not seem to please the man for he withdrew consult again with his companions. After a debate which supposed was animated for the Amahagger, men of few ords who did not indulge in oratory, all of them advanced on and the spokesman said,

The choice of a General does not please us, Hiya. We now that the white man is brave because of the fight he ade against the men of Rezu over the mountain yonder; afternoon marshal them as you think wise, for the battle will take place in the small hours of the following morning, since the People of Lulala only fight at night. I have said.

'Do you not come with us?' I asked, dismayed.

'Nay, not in a war against Rezu, why it matters not. Yo my Spirit will go with you, for I shall watch all that passe how it matters not and perchance you may see it there—know not. On the third day from to-morrow we shall mee again, in the flesh or beyond it, but as I think in the flesh and you can claim the reward which you journeyed here t seek. A place shall be prepared for the white lady whon Rezu would have set up as a rival queen to me. Farewell and farewell also to yonder Bearer of the Axe that shall drink the blood of Rezu, also to the little yellow man who i rightly named Light-in-Darkness, as you shall learn ere all i done.'

Then before I could speak she turned and glided away swiftly surrounded by her guards, leaving me astonished and very uncomfortable.

ALLAN'S VISION

old chamberlain, Billali, conducted us back to our camp. we went he discoursed to me of these Amahagger, of om it seemed he was himself a developed specimen, one threw back, perhaps tens of generations, to some superior estor who lived before they became debased. In substance told me that they were a wild and lawless lot who lived angst ruins or in caves, or some of them in swamp dwelli, in small separate communities, each governed by its ty headman who was generally a priest of their goddess ala.

friginally they and the people of Rezu were the same, in es when they worshipped the sun and moon jointly, but pusands of years' ago, as he expressed it, they had separd, the Rezuites having gone to dwell to the north of the cat Mountain, whence they continually threatened the lalites whom, had it not been for She-who-commands, they uld have destroyed long before. The Rezuites, it seemed. re habitual cannibals, whereas the Lulalite branch of the nahagger only practised cannibalism occasionally when by lucky chance they got hold of strangers. 'Such as yourself, atcher-by-Night, and your companions,' he added with caning. If their crime were discovered, however, Hiya, Sheho-commands, punished it by death.

I asked if she exercised an active rule over these people. le answered that she did not, as she lacked sufficient interest them; only when she was angry with individuals she would lestroy some of them by 'her arts,' as she had power to do if he chose. Most of them indeed had never seen her and only snew of her existence by rumour. To them she was a spirit ar a goddess who inhabited the ancient tombs that lay to the south of the old city whither she had come because of the threatened war with Rezu, whom alone she feared, he did not know why. He told me again, moreover, that she was the greatest magician who had ever been, and that it was certain she did not die, since their forefathers knew her generations ago. Still she seemed to be under some curse, like the Amahagger themselves, who were the descendants of those that had once inhabited Kôr and the country around it, as far the sea-coast and for hundreds of miles inland, having becamighty people in their day before a great plague destroys them.

For the rest he thought that she was a very unhappy wom: who 'lived with her own soul mourning the dead' and co sorting with none upon the earth.

I asked him why she stayed here, whereat he shook head and replied, he supposed because of the 'curse,' sin he could conceive of no other reason. He informed me althat her moods varied very much. Sometimes she was fier and active and at others by comparison mild and low-spirite Just now she was passing through one of the latter stage perhaps because of the Rezu trouble, for she did not wis her people to be destroyed by this terrible person; or perhap for some other reason with which he was not acquainted.

When she chose, she knew all things, except the distartuture. Thus she knew that we were coming, also the detail of our march and that we should be attacked by the Rezult who were going out to meet their returning company that habeen sent afar to find a white queen. Therefore she had ordere him to go with soldiers to our assistance. I asked why st went veiled, and he replied, because of her beauty which drove even savage men mad, so that in old days she habeen obliged to kill a number of them.

That was all he seemed to know about her, except the she was kind to those who served her well, like himself, an protected them from evil of every sort.

Then I asked him about Rezu. He answered that he was dreadful person, undying, it was said, like She-who-command though he had never seen the man himself and never wante to do so. His followers being campibals and having literal eaten up all those that they could reach, were now desiroi of conquering the people of Lulala that they might exthem also at their leisure. Each other they did not eabecause dog does not cat dog, and therefore they were biginning to grow hungry, although they had plenty of grai and cattle of which they used the milk and hides.

As for the coming battle, he knew nothing about it a what would happen, save that She-who-commands said the it would go well for the Lulalates under my direction. Sh was so sure that it would go well, that she did not think worth while to accompany the army, for she hated noise and bloodshed.

It occurred to me that perhaps she was afraid that she too would be taken captive and eaten, but I kept my reflection to myself.

Just then we arrived at our camp-house, where Billali bade me farewell, saying that he wished to rest as he must be back at dawn with litters, when he hoped to find us ready to start. Then he departed. Umslopogaas and Hans also went away sleep, leaving me alone who, having taken my repose in e afternoon, did not feel drowsy at the moment. So lovely is the night indeed that I made up my mind to take a little alk during the midnight hours, after the manner of the nahagger themselves, for having now been recognised as eneralissimo of their forces, I had little fear of being ataked, especially as I carried a pistol in my pocket. So off set strolling slowly down what seemed to have been a main eet of the ancient city, which in its general appearance sembled excavated Pompeii, only on an infinitely larger ale.

As I went I meditated on the strange circumstances in nich I found myself. Really they tempted me to believe at I was suffering from delusions and perhaps all the while fact lay stretched upon a bed in the delirium of fever. at marvellous woman, for instance—even rejecting her tale miraculously extended life, which I did—what was I to ake of her? I did not know, except that wondrous as she as, it remained clear that she claimed a great deal more over than she possessed. This was evident from her tone the interview with the captains, and from the fact that she id shuffled off the command of her tribe on to my shoulders, she were so mighty, why did she not command it herself id bring her celestial, or infernal, powers to bear upon the temy? Again, I could not say, but one fact emerged, namely lat she was as interesting as she was beautiful, and uncomonly clever into the bargain.

But what a task was this that she had laid upon me, to ad into battle, with a foe of unascertained strength, a mob I savages probably quite undisciplined, of whose fighting ualities I knew nothing and whom I had no opportunity I organising. The affair seemed madness and I could only ope that luck or destiny would take me through somehow.

To tell the truth, I believed it would, for I had grown almost superstitious about Zikali and his Great Medicine as was

Hans himself. Certainly the effect of it upon those captains was very odd, or would have been had not the explanation come to me in a flash. On the first night of our meeting, as I have described, I showed this talisman to Ayesha, as a kinc of letter of credentials, and now I could see that it was she who had arranged all the scene with the captains, or their tribal magician, in order to get her way about my appoint ment to the command.

Everything about her conduct bore this out, even her feigning ignorance of the existence of the charm and the leaving of it to Hans to suggest its production, which perhaps she did by influencing his mind subconsciously. No doubt more or less it fitted in with one of those nebulous traditions which are so common amongst ancient savage races, and therefore once shown to her confederate, or confederates, would be accepted by the common people as a holy sign, after which the res was easy.

Such an obvious explanation involved the death of any illusions I might still cherish about this Arab lady, Ayesha and it is true that I parted with them with regret, as we all do when we think we have discovered something wonderful in the female line. But there it was, and to bother any more about her, her history and aims, seemed useless.

So dismissing her and all present anxieties from my mind I began to look about me and to wonder at the marvellous scene which unfolded itself before me in the moonlight. That I might see it better, although I was rather afraid of snakes which might hide among the stones, by an easy ascent I climbed a mount of ruins and up the broad slope of a tumbled massive wall, which from its thickness I judged must have been that of some fort or temple. On the crest of this wall, some seventy or eighty feet above the level of the streets, I sat down and looked about me.

Everywhere around me stretched the ruins of the great city, now as fallen and as deserted as Babylon herself. The majestic loneliness of the place was something awful. Even the vision of companies and battahons of men crossing the plain towards the north with the moonlight glistening on their spear-points, did little to lessen this sense of loneliness. I knew that these were the regiments which I was destined to command, travelling to the camp where I must meet them. But in such silence did they move that no sound came from them even in the deathly stillness of the perfect night, so that almost I was tempted to believe them to be the shadow-phosts

of some army of old Kôr.

They vanished, and musing thus I think I must have dozed. At any rate it seemed to me that of a sudden the city was as it had been in the days of its glory. I saw it brilliant with a hundred colours; everywhere was colour, on the painted walls and roofs, the flowering trees that lined the streets and the bright dresses of the men and women who by thousands crowded them and the marts and squares. Even the chariots that moved to and fro were coloured as were the countless banners which floated from palace walls and temple tops.

The enormous place teemed with every activity of life; brides being borne to marriage and dead men to burial; squadrons marching, clad in glittering armour; merchants chaffering; white-robed priests and priestesses passing in procession (who or what did they worship? I wondered); children breaking out of school; grave philosophers debating in the shadow of a cool arcade; a royal person making a progress preceded by runners and surrounded by slaves, and lastly the multitudes of citizens going about the daily business of Even details were visible, such as those of officers of the law chasing an escaped prisoner who had a broken rope tied to his arm, and a collision between two chariots in a narrow street, about the wrecks of which an idle mob gathered as it does to-day, if two vehicles collide, while the owners argued, gesticulating angrily, and the police and grooms tried to lift a fallen horse on to its feet. Only no sound of the argument or of anything else reached me. I saw, and that was all. The silence remained intense, as well it might do, since those chariots must have come to grief thousands upon thousands of years ago.

A cloud seemed to pass before my eyes, a thin, gauzy cloud which somehow reminded me of the veil that Ayesha wore. Indeed at the moment, although I could not see her, I would have sworn that she was present at my side, and what is more, that she was mocking me who had set her down as so impotent a trickstress, which doubtless was part of the dream.

At any rate I returned to my normal state, and there about me were the miles of desolate streets and the thousands ol broken walls, and the black blots of roofless houses and the wide, untenanted plain bounded by the battlemented line of encircling mountain crests, and above all, the great moon shining softly in a tender sky.

I looked and thrilled, though oppressed by the drear and desolate beauty of the scene around me, descended the wall and the ruined slope and made my way homewards, afraid even of my own shadow. For I seemed to be the only living thing among the dead habitations of immemorial Kôr.

Reaching our camp I found Hans awake and watching for me.

'I was just coming to look for you. Baas,' he said. 'Indeed I should have done so before, only I knew that you had gone to pay a visit to that tall white "Missis" who ties up her head in a blanket, and thought that neither of you would like to be disturbed.'

'Then you thought wrong.' I answered, 'and what is more, if you had made that visit I think it might have been one from which you would never have come back.'

'Oh yes, Baas,' sniggered Hans. The tall white lady would not have minded. It is you who are so particular, after the fashion of men whom Heaven made very shy.'

Without deigning reply to the gibes of Hans I went to lie down, wondering what kind of a bed poor Robertson occupied that night, and soon fell asleep, as fortunately for myself I have the power to do, whatever my circumstances at the moment. Men who can sleep are those who do the work of the world and succeed, though personally I have had more of the work than of the success.

I was awakened at the first grey dawn by Hans, who informed me that Billali was waiting outside with litters, also that Goroko had already made his incantations and doctored Umslopogaas and his two men for war after the Zulu fashion when battle was expected. He added that these Zulus had refused to be left behind to guard and nurse their wounded companions, and said that rather than do so, they would kill them.

Somehow, he informed me, in what way he could not guess, this had come to the ears of the White Lady who hid her face from men because it was so ugly, and she had sent women to attend to the sick ones, with word that they should be well cared for. All of this proved to be true enough, but I need not enter into the details

In the end off we went, I in my litter following Billali's, with an express and a repeating rifle and plenty of ammunition for both, and Hans, also well armed, in that which had been sent for Umslopogaas, who preferred to walk with Goroko and the two other Zulus.

For a little while Hans enjoyed the sensation of being carried by somebody else, and lay upon the cushions smoking with a seraphic smile and addressing sarcastic remarks to the bearers, who fortunately did not understand them. Soon, however, he wearied of these novel delights and as he was still determined not to walk until he was obliged, climbed on to the roof of the litter, astride of which he sat as though it were a horse, looking for all the world like a toy monkey on a horizontal stick.

Our road ran across the level, fertile plain but a small portion of which was cultivated, though I could see that at some time or other, when its population was greater, every inch of it had been under crop. Now it was largely covered by trees, many of them fruit-bearing, between which meandered streams of water which once, I think, had been irrigation channels.

About ten o'clock we reached the foot of the encircling cliffs and began the climb of the escarpment, which was steen tortuous and difficult. By noon we reached its crest and here found all our little army encamped and, except for the sentiles sleeping, as seemed to be the invariable custom of these people in the daytime.

I caused the chief captains to be awakened and with them made a circuit of the camp, reckoning the numbers of the men which came to about 3,250, and learning what I could concerning them and their way of fighting. Then, accompanied by Umslopogaas and Hans with the Zulus as a guard, also by the three head-captains of the Amahagger. I walked forward to study the lie of the land.

Coming to the further edge of the escarpment. I found that at this place two broad-based ridges, shaped like those that spring from the boles of certain tropical forest trees, ran from its crest to the plain beneath at a gentle slope. Moreover I saw that on this plain between the ends of the ridge, an army was camped, which, by the aid of my glasses, I examined and estimated to number at least ten thousand men.

This army, the Amahagger captains informed me, was that of Rezu, who, they said intended to commence his attack at dawn on the following morning since the People of Rezu, being sun-worshippers, would never fight until their god appeared above the horizon Having suited all that was to see I asked the captains to set out their plan of battle, if they had a plan.

The chief of them answered that it was to advance half-way down the right-hand ridge to a spot where there was a narrow flat piece of ground, and there await attack, since at this place their smaller numbers would not so much matter, whereas these made it impossible for them to assail the enemy.

But suppose that Rezu should choose to come up the other ridge and get behind you. What would happen then?

I inquired.

He replied that he did not know, his ideas of strategy being, it was clear, of a primitive order

Do your people fight best at night or in the day?' I went on. He said undoubtedly at night, indeed in all their history there was no record of their having done so in the daytime.

'And yet you propose to let Rezu join battle with you when the sun is high, or in other words to court defeat,' I remarked.

Then I went aside and discussed things for a while with Umslopogaas and Hans, after which I returned and gave my orders, declining all argument. Briefly these were that in the dusk before the rising of the moon, our Amahagger must advance down the right-hand ridge in complete silence, and hide themselves among the scrub which I saw grew thickly near its root. A small party, however, under the leadership of Goroko, whom I knew to be a brave and clever captain, was to pass halfway down the left-hand ridge and there light fires over a wide area, so as to make the enemy think that our whole force had encamped there. Then at the proper moment which I had not yet decided upon, we would attack the army of Rezu.

The Amahagger captains did not seem pleased with this plan which I think was too bold for their fancy, and began to murmur together. Seeing that I must assert my authority at once. I walked up to them and said to their chief man,

'Hearken, my friend By your own wish, not mine, I have been appointed your general and I expect to be obeyed without question. From the moment that the advance begins you will keep close to me and to the Black One, and if so much as one of your men hesitates or turns back, you will die,' and I nodded towards the axe of Umslopogaas. 'Moreover, afterwards She-who-commands will see that others of you die, should you escape in the fight.'

Still they hesitated. Thereon without another word, I produced Zikali's Great Medicine and held it before their even with the result that the sight of this ugly thing did what even the threat of death could not do. They went flat on the ground, every one of them, and swore by Lulala and by She-whocommands, her priestess, that they would do all I said, however mad it seemed to them.

'Good,' I answered. 'Now go back and make ready, and for the rest, by this time tomorrow we shall know who is or is not mad.'

From that moment till the end I had no more trouble with these Amahagger.

I will get on quickly with the story of this fight whereof the preliminary details do not matter. At the proper time Goroko went off with two hundred and fifty men and one of the two Zulus to light the fires and, at an agreed signal, namely the firing of two shots in rapid succession by myself, to begin shouting and generally make as much noise as they could.

We also went off with the remaining three thousand, and before the moon rose, crept as quietly as ghosts down the right-hand ridge. Being such a silent folk who were accustomed to move at night and could see in the dark almost as well as cats, the Amahagger executed this manoeuvre solecdidly, wrapping their spear-blades in bands of dry grass lest light should glint on them and betray our movements. So Edue course we came to the patch of bush where the rules widened out about five hundred yards from the plain commitand there lay down in four companies or regiments each of them about seven hundred and fifty strong.

Now the moon had risen, but because of this white covered the surface of the plain, we could see nothing of the camp of Rezu which we knew must be within a thousand wards of us, unless indeed it had been moved, as the silence seeme? to suggest.

This circumstance gave me much anxiety, since I feared less abandoning their reputed habits, these Rezuites were also contemplating a night attack. Umslopogaas, too, was disturbed on the subject, though because of Goroko and his men whose fires began to twinkle on the opposing ridge something over a mile away, they could not pass up there without our

Still, for aught I knew there might be other ways of scaling this mountain. I did not trust the Amahagger, who declared hat none existed, since their local knowledge was slight as hey never visited these northern slopes because of their fear of Rezu. Supposing that the enemy gained the crest and suddenly assaulted us in the rear! The thought of it made me feel cold down the back.

While I was wondering how I could find out the truth, Hans, who was squatted behind a bush, suddenly rose and gave the rifle he was carrying to the remaining Zulu.

'Bass,' he said, 'I am going to look and find out what those people are doing, if they are still there, and then you will know how and when to attack them. Don't be afraid for me, Baas, it will be easy in that mist and you know I can move like a snake. Also if I should not come back, it does not matter and it will tell you that they are there.'

I hesitated who did not wish to expose the brave little. Hottentot to such risks. But when he understood, Umslopogaas said.

"Let the man go. It is his gift and duty to spy, as it is mine to smite with the axe, and yours to lead, Macumazahn. Let him go, I say.'

I nodded my head, and having kissed my hand in his silly fashion in token of much he did not wish to say, Hans slipped out of sight, saying that he hoped to be back within an hour. Except for his great knite, he went unarmed, who feared that if he took a pistol he might be tempted to fire it and make a noise.

XVII

THE MIDNIGHT BALLLE

That hour weed by very slowly. Again and again I consulted my watch by the light of the moon, which was now again high in the heavest and thought that it would never count to an end. Listen as I would, there was nothing to be hourd, and as the mist still prevailed the only thing I could say except the heavens, was the trainkling of the fires lit by Gotoko and his party.

At length it was done and there was no sign of Hims

Another half hour passed and still no sign of Hans.

I think that Light-in-Darkness is dead or taken prisoner, said Umslopnymas.

I answered that I feared so, but that I would give him another fifteen minutes and then, if he did not appear, I proposed to order an advance, hoping to find the enemy where we had last seen them from the top of the mountain.

The fifteen minuter went by also, and as I could see that the Amahager capains who sat at a little distance were getting very nervous. I picked up my double-barrelled rifle and turned round so that I faced up hill with a view of firing it as had been agreed with Goroko, but in such a fashion that the flashes perhaps would not be seen from the plain below. For this purpose I moved a few yards to the left to get behind the trunk of a tree that grew there, and was already lifting the filter my shoulder, when a yellow hand clasped the barrel and a furly rathe said.

Drifting and there was the ugly face of Hans wearing and there was the ugly face of Hans wearing and the regiment of the man in the moon.

Well I mil vil evid indifference, assumed I admit to hide my processive for at his safe return, 'tell on, and be that about it I suppose you lost your way and never found that

Ye. Bees, I lost my ver for the fog was very thick down there. But in the end I found them all right, by my nose, Beet, for inose man-eating people smell strong and I got the wind of one of their sentrics. It was easy to pass him in the mist, Baas, so easy that I was tempted to cut his throat as I went, but I didn't for fear lest he should make a noise. No, I walked on right into the middle of them, which was easy too, for they were all asleep, wrapped up in blankets. They hadn't any fires because they did not want them to be seen, or perhaps because it is so hot down in that low land, I don't know which.

So I crept on taking note of all I saw, till at last I came to a little hill of which the top rose above the level of the mist, so that I could see on it a long hut built of green boughs with the leaves still fresh upon them. Now I thought that I would crawl up to the hut since it came into my mind that Rezu himself might be sleeping there and that I might kill him. But while I stood hesitating I heard a noise like to that made by an old woman whose husband had thrown a blanket over her head to keep her quiet, or to that of a bee in a bottle, a sort of droning noise that reminded me of something.

'I thought a while and remembered that when Red-Beard was on his knees praying to Heaven, as is his habit when he has nothing else to do, Bass, he makes a noise just like that I crept towards the sound and presently there I found Red-Beard himself tied upon a stone and looking as mad as a buffalo bull stuck in a swamp, for he shook his head and rolled his eyes about, just as though he had two bottles of bad gin, Baas, and all the while he kept saying prayers. Now I thought that I would cut him loose, and bent over him to do so, when by ill-luck he saw my face and began to shout, saying,

'Go away, you yellow devil. I know you have come to take me to hell, but you are too soon, and if my hands were loose I would twist your head off your shoulders.'

'He said this in English, Baas, which as you know I can understand quite well, after which I was sure that I had better leave him alone Whilst I was thinking, there came out of the hut above two old men dressed in night-shirts, such as you white people wear, with yellow things upon their heads that had a metal picture of the sun in front of them.'

'Medicine-men,' I suggested,

'Yes, Baas, or Predikants of some sort, for they were rather like your reverend father when he dressed himself up and went into a box to preach. Seeing them I slipped back a little way to where the mist began, lay down and listened. They looked at Red-Beard, for his shouts at me had brought ould-to save that unfortunate man, Robertson, who, from Ians' account, evidently was now quite mad and raving. So fired the two shots as had been arranged and presently heard he sound of distant shoutings on the slope of the opposing idge. A few minutes later we started, Umslopogaas and I leading the vanguard and the Amahagger captains following with the three remaining companies.

Now the reader, presuming the existence of such a person.

t once: indeed I insisted on this, as I was determined if I will think that everything is sure to go right; that this cuning old fellow, Allan Quatermain, is going to surprise and wipe the floor with those Rezultes, who were already beguiled by the trick he had instructed Goroko to play. That after his he will rescue Robertson who doubtless shortly recovers is mind, also Inez with the greatest ease; in fact that everyning will happen as it ought to do if this were a romance enstead of a mere record of remarkable facts. But being the latter, as it happened, matters did not work out quite in this convenient way.

To begin with, when those Amahagger told me that the tezuites never fought in the dark or before the sun was well p, either they lied or they were much mistaken, for at any ate on this occasion they did the exact contrary. All the while that we thought we were stalking them, they were stalking us. The Goroko manoeuvre had not deceived them in the east, since from their spies they knew its exact significance. Here, I may add that those spies were in our own ranks.

Here, I may add that those spies were in our own ranks, raitors, in short, who were really in the pay of Rezu and ossibly belonged to his abominable faith, some of whom ipped away from time to time to the enemy to report our rogress and plans, so far as they knew them.

Further, what Hans had stumbled on was a mere rear guard ft around the place of sacrifice and the hut where Inez was infined. The real army he never found at all. That was vided into two bodies and hidden in bush to the right and it of the ridge which we were descending just at the spothere it joined the plain beneath, and into the jaws of these warmies we marched guily

Now that hypothetical reader will say, 'Why didn't the ly old fool. Allan, think of all these things? Why didn't remember that he was commanding a pack of savages whom he had no real acquaintance, among whom there were to be traitors, especially as they were of the same blothe Rezuites, and take precautions?'

Ah! my dear reader, I will only answer that I wish you had handled the job yourself, and enjoyed the opportunity of seeing what you could do in the circumstances. Do you suppose I didn't think of all these points? Of course I did. But have you ever heard of the difficulty of making silk purses out of sows' ears, or of turning a lot of gloomy and disagreeable barbarians whom you had never even drilled, into trustworthy and efficient soldiers ready to fight three times their own number and beat them?

Also I beg to observe that I did get through somehow, as you shall learn, which is more than you might have done. Mr. Wisdom, though I admit, not without help from another quarter. It is all very well for you to sit in your armchair and be sapient and turn up your learned nose, like the gentlemen who criticise plays and poems, an easy job compared to the writing of them. From all of which, however, you will understand that I am, to tell the truth, rather ashamed of what followed, since qui s'excuse, s'accuse.

As we slunk down that hill in the moonlight, a queer-looking crowd, I admit also that I felt very uncomfortable. To begin with, I did not like that remark of the Medicine-man which Hans reported, to the effect of the feast must come after the victory, especially as he had said just before that Robertson was to be sacrificed as the sun rose, which would seem to suggest that the 'victory' was planned to take place before that event.

While I was ruminating upon this subject, I looked round for Hans to cross-examine him as to the priest's exact words, only to find that he had slunk off somewhere. A few minutes later he reappeared, running back toward us swiftly and, I noticed, taking shelter behind tree trunks and rocks as he came.

'Baas,' he gasped, for he was out of breath, 'be careful, those Rezu men are on either side ahead. I went forward and ran into them. They threw many spears at me. Look!' and he showed a slight cut on his arm from which blood was flowing.

Instantly I understood that we were ambushed and began to think very hard indeed. As it chanced we were passing across a large flat space upon the ridge, say seven or eight acres in extent, where the bush grew lightly, though owing to the soil being better, the trees were tall.

On the steep slope below this little plain it seemed to be denser and there it was, according to Hans, that the ambush was set. I halted my regiment and sent back messengers to the others that they were to halt also as they came up, on the pretext of giving them a rest before they were marshalled and we advanced to the battle.

Then I told Umslopogaas what Hans said and asked him to send out his Zulu soldier whom we could trust, to see if he could obtain confirmation of the report. This he did at once. Also I asked him what he thought should be done, supposing that it was true.

'Form the Amahagger into a ring or a square and await attack,' he answered

I nodded, for that was my own opinion, but replied,

If they were Zulus, the plan would be good. But how do we know if these men will stand

'We know nothing, Macumazahn, and therefore can only

try. If they run it must be up-hill.'

Then I called the captains and told them what was toward, which seemed to alarm them very much. Indeed one or two of them wanted to retreat at once, but I said I would shoot the first man who tried to do so. In the end they agreed to my plan and said that they would post their best soldiers above, at the top of the square, with orders to stop any attempt at a flight up the mountain

After this we formed up the square as best we could; arranging it in a rather rough, four-fold line. While we were doing this we heard some shouts below and presently the Zulu returned, who reported that all was as Hans had said and that Rezu's men were moving round us, having discovered, as he thought, that we had halted and escaped their ambush.

Still the attack did not develop at once, for the reason that the Rezu army was crawling up the steep flanks of the spur on either side of the level piece of ground, with a view of encircling us altogether, so as to make a clean sweep of our force. As a matter of fact, considered from our point of view, this was a most fortunate move, since thereby they stopped any attempt at a retreat on the part of our Amahagger, whose bolt-hole was now blocked.

When we had done all we could, we sat down, or at least I did, and waited. The night, I remember, was strangely still, only from the slopes on either side of our plateau came a kind of rustling sound which in fact was caused by the feet of Rezu's people, as they marched to surround us.

It ceased at last and the silence grew complete, so much so that I could hear the teeth of some of our tall Amahagger chattering with fear, a sound that gave me little confidence and caused Umslopogaas to remark that the hearts of these big men had never grown; they remained 'as those of babies.' I told the captains to pass the word down the ranks that those who stood might live, but those who fled would certainly die. Therefore if they wished to see their homes again they had better stand and fight like men. Otherwise most of them would be killed and the rest eaten by Rezu. This was done, and I observed that the message seemed to produce a steadying effect upon our ranks.

Suddenly all round us, from below, from above and on either side there broke a most awful roar which seemed to shape itself into the word, Rezu, and next minute also from above, below and either side, some ten thousand men poured forth upon our square.

In the moonlight they looked very terrible with their flowing white robes and great gleaming spears. Hans and I fired some shots, though for all the effect they produced, we might s well have pelted a breaker with pebbles. Then, as I thought nat I should be more useful alive than dead, I retreated ithin the square, Umslopogaas, his Zulu, and Hans coming ith me.

On the whole our Amahagger stood the attack better than expected. They beat back the first rush with considerable ass to the enemy, also the second after a longer struggle. Then there was a pause during which we re-formed our ranks, tragging the wounded men into the square.

Scarcely had we done this when with another mighty shout of 'Rezu!' the enemy attacked again—that was about an iour after the battle had begun. But now they had changed heir tactics, for instead of trying to rush all sides of the square at once, they concentrated their efforts on the western front, that which faced towards the plain below.

On they came, and among them in the forefront of the battle, now and again I caught sight of a gigantic man, a huge creature who seemed to me to be seven feet high and big in proportion. I could not see him clearly because of the uncertain moonlight, but I noted his fierce aspect, also that he had an enormous beard, black streaked with grey, that flowed down to his middle, and that his hair hung in masses upon his shoulders.

'Rezu himself!' I shouted to Umslopogaas.

'Aye, Macumazahn, Rezu himself without doubt, and I rejoice to see him for he will be a worthy foe to fight. Look!

he carries an axe as I do. Now I must save my strength for when we come face to face I shall need it all.'

I thought that I would spare Umslopogaas this exertion and watched my opportunity to put a bullet through this giant. But I could never get one. Once when I had covered him an Amahagger rushed in front of my gun so that I could not shoot, and when a second chance came a little cloud floated over the face of the moon and made him invisible. After that I had other things to which to attend, since, as I expected would happen, the western face of our square gave, and yelling like devils, the enemy began to pour in through the gap.

A cold thrill went through me for I saw that the game was up. To re-form these undisciplined Amahagger was impossible; nothing was to be expected except panic, rout and slaughter. I cursed my folly for ever having had anything to do with the business, while Hans screamed to me in a thin voice that the only chance was for us three and the Zulu to bolt and hide in the bush.

I did not answer him because, apart from any nasty pride, the thing was impossible, for how could we get through those struggling masses of men which surrounded us on every side? No, my clock had struck, so I went on making a kind of mental, sandwich of prayers and curses, prayers for my soul and forgiveness of my sins, and curses on the Amahagger and everything to do with them, especially Zikali and the woman called Ayesha, who, between them, had led me into this affair.

'Perhaps the Great Medicine of Zikali,' piped Hans again as he fired a rifle at the advancing foe-

'Hang the Great Medicine.' I shouted back, 'and Ayesha with it. No wonder she declined to take a hand in this business.'

As I spoke the words I saw old Billah, who not being a man of war was keeping as close to us as he could, go flat onto his venerable face, and reflected that he must have got a thrown spear through him Casting a hurried glance at him to see if he were done for or only wounded, out of the corner of my eye I caught sight of something diaphanous which gleamed in the moonlight and reminded me of I knew not what at the moment.

I looked round quickly to see what it might be and lo! there, almost at my side was the veiled Ayesha herself, holding in her hand a little rod made of black wood inlaid with ivory not unlike a field marshal's baton, or a sceptre.

I never saw her come and to this day I do not know how she did so; she was just there and what is more she must have put luminous paint or something else on he modes. In the gleamed with a sort of faint, phosphorescent he will be the moonlight made her conspicuous all over the field of battle. Nor did she speak a single word, she call when he rod, pointed with it towards the fierce hordes who were ing near to us, killing as they came, and regard to more financially with a gliding motion.

The men of Rezu also, and I suppose the first frammenself, for I saw no more of him at that the factor in a monumently fast over the edge of the places towards the plain beneath. In fact they broke into flight and least over dead and dying, we rushed after them, always at the gleaming robe of Ayesha, who must have the tremely agile person, since without any appears and held for piace a few steps ahead of the

THE SLAYING OF REZU

At last we were on the plain, the bemused remnant of army still doubling before us like a mob of game i by wild dogs. Here we halted to re-form our ranks: it to me, although still she spoke no word, that some reached me from the gleaming Ayesha that I should do this. The business took twenty minutes or so, and then numbering about two thousand five hundred strong, for the rest had fallen in the fight of the square, we advanced again.

Now there came that dusk which often precedes the rising of the sun, and through it I could see the battle was not yet. over, since gathered in front of us was still a force about equal to our own. Ayesha pointed towards it with her wand and we leapt forward to the attack. Here the men of Rezu stood awaiting us, for they seemed to overcome their terror with the approach of day

The battle was herce, a very strange battle in that dim, uncertain light, which scarcely showed us friend from foe. Indeed I am not sure that we should have won it, since Avesha was no longer visible to give our Amahagger confidence, and as the courage of the Rezultes increased, so theirs seemed to . lessen with the passing of the night.

Fortunately, however, just as the issue hung doubtful, there was a shout to our left and looking, I made out the tall shape of Goroko, the witch-doctor, with the other Zulu, followed by his two hundred and fifty men, and leaping on to the flank of the line of Rezu

That settled the business. The enemy crumpled up and melted, and just then the first lights of dawn appeared in the sky. I looked about me for Ayesha, but she had gone, where to I knew not, though at the moment I feared that she must have been killed in the mêlée.

Then I gave up looking and thinking, since now or never was the time for action. Signalling and shouting to those. hatchet-faced Amahagger to advance, accompanied by Umslopogaas with Goroko who had joined us, and Hans, I' sprang forward to give them an example which, to be just to them, they took.

'This is the mound on which Red-Beard should be,' oued

Hans as we faced a little slope.

I ran up it and through the gloom which precedes the actual dawn, saw a group of men gathered round something. as people collect about a street accident.

'Red-Beard on the stone. They are killing him,' screeniss!

Hans again,

It was so; at least several white-robed priests were bending over a prostrate figure with knives in their hands, while behind stood the huge fellow whom I took to be Rezu, staring towards the east as though he were waiting for the rim of the sun to appear before he gave some order. At that very moment it did appear, just a thin edge of bright light on the izon, and then he turned, shouting the order. oo late! For we were on them. Umslopogaas cut down of the priests with his axe, and the men about me dealt the others, while Hans with a course of sweeps of his knife, severed the cords with which Robertson was fied. he poor man who in the growing light I could see was ing mad, sprang up, calling our something in Scotch about deil.' turned and stood at bay.

Umslopogaas halted also, waiting for us to come up, since, cunning old warrior as he was, he feared lest should he begin the fight before that happened, the horde of them would fall on him. Thirty seconds later we arrived and found him standing still with bent body, small shield advanced and the great axe raised as though in the act of striking, a wondrous picture outlined as it was against the swiftly-rising sun.

Some ten paces away stood the giant leaning on the axe he bore, which was not unlike to that with which woodmen fell big trees. He was an evil man to see and at this, my first full sight of him. I likened him in my mind to Goliath whom David overthrew. Huge he was and hairy, with deep-set, piercing eyes and a great hooked nose. His face seemed thin and ancient also, when with a motion of the great head, he tossed his long locks back from about it, but his limbs were those of a Hercules and his movements full of a youthful vigour. Moreover his aspect as a whole was that of a devilrather than of a man; indeed the sight of it sickened me.

'Let me shoot him.' I cried to Umslopogaas, for I had reloaded the rifle as I ran

'Nay, Watcher-by-Night,' answered the Zulu without moving his head, 'rifle has had its chance and failed. Now let us see what axe can do. If I cannot kill this man, I will be borne, hence feet first who shall have made a long journey for nothing'

Then the giant began to talk in a low, rumbling voice that reverberated from the slope of the little hill behind us.

'Who are you,' he asked, speaking in the same tongue that the Amahagger use, 'who dare to come face to face with Rezu? Black hound, do you not know that I cannot be slain who have lived a year for every week of your life's days, and set my foot upon the necks of men by thousands. Have you not seen the spear shatter and the iron balls melt upon my breast like rain-drops, and would you try to bring me down with that toy you carry? My army is defeated—I know it. But what matters that when I can get me more? Because the sacrifice was not completed and the white queen was not wed, therefore my army was defeated by the magic of Lulala; the White Witch who dwells in the tombs. But I am not defeated who cannot be slain until I show my back, and then only by a certain axe which long ago has rusted into dust.'

Now of this long speech Umslopogaas understood nothing, so I answered for him, briefly enough, but to the point, for there flashed into my mind all Ayesha's tale about an axe,

'A certain axe!' I cried. 'Aye, a certain axe! Well, look at that which is held by the Black One, the captain who is named Slaughterer, the ancient axe whose title is Chieftainess, because if so she wills, she takes the lives of all. I are at it well, Rezu, Giant and Wizard, and say whether it is not that which your forefather lost, that which is destined to bring you to your doom?'

Thus I spoke, very loudly that all might hear, slowly also, pausing between each word because I wished to give time for the light to strengthen, seeing as I did that the rays of the rising sun struck upon the face of the giant, whereas the eyes of Umslopogaas were less dazzled by it.

Rezu heard, and stared at the axe which Umslopognas held aloft, causing it to quiver slightly by an imperceptible motion of his arm. As he stared I saw his hideous face change. and that on it for the first time gathered a look of something resembling fear. Also his followers behind him who were also studying the axe, began to murmur together.

For here I should say that as though by common consent the battle had been stayed; we no longer attacked and the enemy no longer ran. They, or those who were left of them stood still as though they felt that the real and ultimate issue of the fight depended upon the forthcoming duel between these two champions, though of that issue they had little doubt since, as I learned afterwards, they believed their king to be invulnerable.

For quite a while Rezu went on staring. Then he said aloud as if he were thinking to himself,

'It is like, very like. The horn haft is the same; the pointed gouge is the same; the blade shaped like the young moon is the same. Almost could I think that before me shook the ancient holy axe. Nay, the gods have taken that back long ago and this is but a trick of the witch, Lulala of the Caves."

Thus he spoke, but still for a moment hesitated.

'Umslopogaas,' I said in the deep silence that followed, 'hear me."

'l hear you.' he answered without turning his head or moving his arms. 'What counsel, Watcher-by-Night?'

This, Slaughterer. Strike not at that man's face and breast, for there I think he is protected by witchcraft or by armour. Get behind him and strike at his back. Do you understand?

'Nay, Macumazahn, I understand not. Yet I will do you bidding because you are wiser than I and utter no empt words. Now be still.'

Then Umslopogaas threw the axe into the air and caught as it fell, and as he did so began to chant his own praise

'Oho!' he said, 'I am the child of the Lion, the Black maned Lion, whose claws never loosened of their prey. I ar the Wolf-king, he who hunted with the wolves upon the Witch mountain with my brother, Bearer of the Club named Watcher of-the-Fords. I am he who slew him called the Unconquered Chief of the People of the Axe, he who bore the ancient Ax before me: I am he who smote the Halakazi tribe in thei caves and won me Nada the Lily to wife. I am he who too to the King Dingaan a gift that he loved little, and afterward with Mopo, my foster-sire, hurled this Dingaan down to death. I am the Royal One, named Bulalio the Slaughterer named Woodpecker, named Umhlopekazi the Captain, before whom never yet man has stood in fair and open fight. Now thou Wizard Rezu, now thou Giant, now thou Ghost-man come on against me and before the sun has risen by a hand' breadth, all those who watch shall see which of us is bette at the game of war Come on, then! Come on, for I say tha my blood boils over and my feet grow cold. Come on, thou grinning dog, thou monster grown fat with eating the flesh o men, thou hook-heaked vulture, thou old, grey-whiskered wolf!

Thus he chanted in his fierce, boastful way, while his two remaining Zulus clapped their hands and sentence by sentence echoed his words, and Goroko, the witch-doctor, muttered incantations behind him

While he sang thus Umslopogaas began to stir. First only his head and shoulders moved gently, swaying from side it side like a reed shaken in the wind or a snake about to strike Then slowly he put out first one foot and next the other and drew them back again, as a dancer might do, tempting Rezito attack.

But the grant would not, his shield held before him, his stood still and waited to see what this black warrior would do.

The snake struck. Umslopogaas darted in and let drive with the long axe. Rezu raised his shield above his head and caught the blow. From the clank it made I knew that this shield which seemed to be of hide, was lined with iron. Rezu

So he spoke and with springing movements tried to get st Rezu, first to the right and then to the left, all the while eping out of reach. But Rezu ever turned and faced him he did so retreating step by step down the slope of the little ll and striking whenever he found a chance, but without rail, for always Umslopogaas was beyond his reach. Also e sunlight which now grew strong, dazzled him, or so l ought. Moreover he seemed to tire somewhat-or so I ought also.

At any rate he determined to make an end of the play, for ith a swift motion, as Umslopogaas had done, he threw away s shield and grasping the iron handle of his axe with both ands, charged the Zulu like a bull. Umslopogaas leapt back it of reach. Then suddenly he turned and ran up the rise. es, Bulalio the Slaughterer ran!

A roar of mockery went up from the sun-worshippers beind, while our Amahagger laughed and Goroko and the two ulus stared astonished and ashamed. Only I read his mind right and wondered what guile he had conceived.

He ran, and Rezu ran after him, but never could he catch e swiftest-footed man in Zululand. To and fro he followed im, for Umslopogaas was taking a zig-zag path towards the est of the slope, till at length Rezu stopped breathless. But Imslopogaas still ran another twenty yards or so until he eached the top of the slope and there halted and wheeled nınd For ten seconds or more he stood drawing his breath in reat gasps, and looking at his face, I saw that it had become s the face of a wolf. His lips were drawn up into a terrible in, showing the white teeth between; his cheeks seemed to ave fallen in and his eyes glared, while the skin over the hole his forehead best up and down.

There he stood, gathering himself together as for some ighty effort 'Run on!' shouted the spectators 'Run back to Kôr, black

)g! Umslopogaas knew that they were mocking him, but he took heed, only bent down and rubbed his sweating hand in the it of the dry earth. Then he straightened himself and arged down on Rezu

I, Allan Quatermain, have seen many things in battle, t never before or since did I see aught like to this charge. was swift as that of a honess, so swift that the Zulu's feet ircely seemed to touch the ground. On he sped like a fell upon the body of their ancient foe like hounds upon a helpless fox, and with hands and spears and knives literally fore and hacked it limb from limb, till no semblance of humanity remained.

It was impossible to stop them; indeed I was too outworn with labours and emotions to make any such attempt. This I regret the more since I lost the opportunity of making an examination of the body of this troll-like man, and of ascertaining what kind of armour it was he wore beneath that great beard of his, which was strong enough to stop my bullets; and even the razor edge of the axe Inkonkuus driven with all the might of the arms of the Zulu. Bulaho. For when I looked again at the sickening sight the giant was but scattered fragments and the armour, whatever it might have been, was gone, rent to little pieces and carried off, douotless, by the Amahagger, perhaps to be divided between them to serve as charms.

So of Rezu I know only that he was the hugest, most terrible-looking man I have ever seen, one too who carried his vast strength very late in life since from the aspect of his countenance I imagine that he must have been nigh upon seventy years of age, though his supposed unnatural antiquity of course was nothing but a fable put about by the natives for their own purposes.

Presently Umslopogass seemed to recover from the kind of faint into which he had fallen and opening his eyes, looked about him. The first person they fell on was old Billali who stood stocking his white heard and contemplating the scene with an air which was at once philosophic and satisfied.

This seemed to anger Umslopogaus, for he cried,

I think it was you, ancient hag of words and sweeper of paths for the feet of the great, who made a mock of me but now, when you thought that I fled before the horns of yonder man-eating bull—' and he nedded towards the fragments of what once had been Rezu. I and now his axe and though I am weak and weary, I will wash away the insult with your blood.'

'What does this giorious black hero say, Watcher-by-Night?' asked Billah in his most courteous tones.

I told him word by word, whereon Billali lifted his hands in horror, turned and fled. Nor did I see him again until we arrived at Kôr.

At the sight of the fall of their giant chief Rezu whom they believed to be invulnerable, his i watching the fray, set up a great wailing, a meanny noise to hear. Then, as I think di Philistines when David brought down Goliath by ble shot with a stone, they set out for their homes hese may have been, at an absolutely record pace and in ompletest disarray.

Our Amahagger followed them for a while, but soon were eft standing still. So they contented themselves with killing ny wounded they could find and returned. I did not acompany them; indeed the battle being won, metaphorically washed my hands of them, and in my thought consigned iem to a certain locality as a people of whom it might well e said that manners they had none and their customs were mply beastly. Also, although fierce and cruel, these nightats were not good fighting men and in short never did I wish have to do with such another company.

Moreover a very different matter pressed. The object of this isiness so far as I was concerned, had been to rescue poor ez, since had it not been for her sake, never would I have insented to lead those Amahagger against their fellow ackguards, the Rezuites.

But where was Inez? If Hans had understood the medicinean aright, she was, or had been in the hut, where it was y earnest hope that she still remained, since otherwise the int must be continued. This at any rate was easy to discover. alling Hans, who was amusing himself by taking long shots the flying enemy, so that they might not forget him, as said, and the Zulus, I walked up the slope to the hut, or ther booth of boughs, for it was quite twenty feet long twelve or fifteen broad.

At its eastern end was a doorway or opening closed with a avy curtain. Here I paused full of tremors, and listened, r to tell the truth I dreaded to draw that curtain, fearing hat I might see within. Gathering up my courage at length tore it aside and, a revolver in my hand, looked in. At first ter the strong light without, for the sun was now well up. I ould see nothing, since those green boughs and palm leaves ere very closely woven. As my eyes grew accustomed to ne gloom, however, I perceived a glittering object seated on kind of throne at the end of the booth, while in a double ow in front knelt six white-robed women who seemed to wear hains about their necks and carried large knives slung round heir middles. On the floor between these women and the fell upon L'dead man, a priest of some sort as I gathered from helpleso, who still held a huge spear in his hand. So silent to the figure on the throne and those that knelt before it, that at first I thought that all of them must be dead.

'Lady Sad-Eyes, Baas,' whispered Hans, 'and her bridewomen. Doubtless that old Predikant came to kill her when he saw that the battle was lost, but the bride-women killed him with their knives."

Here I may state that Hans' suppositions proved to be quite correct, which shows how quick and deductive was his mind. The figure on the throne was linez, the priest in his disappointed rage had come to kill her, and the bridewomen had killed him with their knives before he could do so.

I bade the Zulus tear down the circuit and pull away some of the end boughs, so as to let in more light. Then we advanced up the place, holding our pistols and spears in readiness. The kneeling women turned their heads to look at us and I saw that they were all young and handsome in their fashion, although fierce-faced. Also I saw then hands go to the knives they wore. I called to them to let these be and come out, and that if they did so they had nothing to fear. But if they understood, they did not heed my words.

On the contrary while Hans and I covered them with our pistols, fearing lest they should stab the person on the throne whom we took to be finez, at some word from one of them, they bowed simultaneously towards her, then at another word suddenly they drew the knives and plunged them to their own hearis!

It was a dreadful sight and one of which I never saw the like. Nor to this day do I know why the deed was done, unless perhaps the women were sworn to the service of the new queen and feared that if they failed to protect her, they would be doomed to some awful end. At any rate we got them out dead or dying for their blows had been strong and true, and not one of them lived for more than a few minutes.

Then I advanced to the figure on the throne, or rather foot-stooled chair of black wood inlaid with ivory, which sat so silent and metionless that I was certain it was that of a dead woman, especially when I perceived that she was fastened to the chair with leathern straps which were sewn over with gold wire. Also she was veiled and, with one exception, made up, if I may use the term, exactly to resemble the lady Ayesha, even down to the two long plaits of black hair, each finished with some kind of pearl and to the sandalled feet.

The exception was that about her hung gold ornaments from which were suspen of gold representing the rayed disc of the su and striking workmanship.

I went to her and having cut the straps, since stop to untie their knots, lifted the veil.

Beneath it was Inez sure enough, and Inez li breast rose and fell as she breathed, but Inez senseless. Research eyes were wide open, yet she was quite senseless. Probably she had been drugged, or perhaps some of the sights of horse; which she saw, had taken away her mind. I confess that I was glad that this was so, who otherwise must have told her the dreadful story of her father's end.

We bore her out and away from that horrible place, apparently quite unhurt, and laid her under the shadow of a tree till a litter could be procured. I could do no more who knew not how to treat her state, and had no spirits with me to pour down her throat.

This was the end of our long pursuit, and thus we rescued Inez, whom the Zulus called the Lady Sad-Eyes.

THE SPELL

Or our return to Kôr I need say nothing, except that in due course we reached that interesting ruin. The journey was chiefly remarkable for one thing, that on this occasion. I imagine, for the first and last time in his life, Umslopogaas consented to be carried in a litter, at least for part of the way. He was, as I have said, unwounded, for the axe of his mighty foe had never once so much as touched his skin. What he suffered from was shock, a kind of collapse, since, although few would have thought it, this great and utterly fearless warrior was at bottom a nervous, highly-strung man.

It is only the nervous that climb the highest points of anything, and this is true of fighters as of all others. That fearful fray with Rezu had been a great strain on the Zulu. As he put it himself, the wizard had sucked the strength out of him, especially when he found that owing to his armour he could not harm him in front, and owing to his cunning could not get at him behind. Then it was that he conceived the desperate expedient of leaping over his head and smitting backwards as he leapt, a trick, he told me, that he had once played years before when he was young, in order to break a shield ring and reach one who stood in its centre.

In this great leap over Rezu's head Umslopogaas knew he must succeed, or be slain, which in turn would mean my death and that of the others. For this reason he faced the shame of seeming to fly in order to gain the higher ground, whence alone he could gather the speed necessary to such a terrific spring.

Well, he made it and thereby conquered, and this was the end, but as he said, it had left him 'weak as a snake when it, crawls out of its hole into the sun after the long winter sleep.'

Of one thing, Umslopogaas added, he was thankful, namely that Rezu had never succeeded in getting his arms round him, since he was quite certain that if he had he would have broken him 'as a baboon breaks a mealie-stalk.' No strength, not even his, could have resisted the iron might of that huge, gorilla-like man.

I agreed with him who had noted Rezu's vast chest and swelling muscles, also the weight of the blows that he struck with the steel-hafted axe (which, by the way, when I sought for it, was missing, stolen, I suppose, by one of the Amahagger).

Whence did that strength come. I wondered, in one who from his face appeared to be old? Was there perchance. after all, some truth in the legend of Samson and did it dwell in that gigantic beard and those long locks of his? It was impossible to say and probably the man was but a Herculean freak, for that he was as strong as Hercules all the stories that I heard afterwards of his feats, left little room for doubt

About one thing only was I certain in connection with him. namely, that the tales of his supernatural attributes were the merest humbug. He was simply one of the representatives of the family of 'strong men.' of whom examples are still to be seen doing marvellous feats all over the earth.

For the rest, he was dead and broken up by those Amaz hagger blood-hounds before I could examine him, or his bodyarmour either, and there was an end of him and his story. But when I looked at the corpse of poor Robertson, which I did as we buried it where he fell, and saw that though so large and thick-set, it was cleft almost in two by a single blow of Rezu's axe. I came to understand what the might of this savage must have been.

I say savage, but I am not sure that this is a right description of Rezu. Evidently he had a religion of a sort, also imagination, as was shown by the theft of the white woman to be his queen: by his veiling of her to resemble Ayesha whom he dreaded: by the intended propitiztory sacrifice: by the guard of women sworn to her service who slew the priest that tried to kill her, and afterwards committed suicide when they had failed in their office, and by other things. All this indicated something more than savagery, perhaps survivals from a forgotten civilisation, or perhaps native ability on the part of an individual ruler. I do not know and it matters nothing.

Rezu is dead and the world is well rid of him. and those who want to learn more of his people can go to study such as remain of them in their own habitat, which for my part I never wish to visit any more.

During our journey to Kôr poor Inez never stirred. Whenever I went to look at her in the litter, I found her lying there

OF our return to Kôr I need say nothing, except that in due course we reached that interesting ruin. The journey was chiefly remarkable for one thing, that on this occasion. For this reason he faced the shame of seeming to fly in order to gain the higher ground, whence alone he could gather the speed necessary to such a terrific spring.

Well, he made it and thereby conquered, and this was the end, but as he said, it had left him 'weak as a snake when it crawls out of its hole into the sun after the long winter sleep.'

I say savage, but I am not sure that this is a right desiption of Rezu. Evidently he had a religion of a sort, also agination, as was shown by the theft of the white woman to his queen; by his veiling of her to resemble Ayesha whom dreaded; by the intended propitiatory sacrifice; by the lard of women sworn to her service who slew the priest that led to kill her, and afterwards committed suicide when the id failed in their office, and by other things. Rezu is dead and the world is well rid of him, and thos ho want to learn more of his people can go to study such a main of them in their own habitat, which for my part ever wish to visit any more.

During our journey to Kôr poor Inez never stirred Whenver I went to look at her in the litter, I found her lying there with her eyes open and a fixed stare upon her face which frightened me very much, since I began to fear lest she should die. However I could do nothing to help her, except urgo the bearers to top speed. So swiftly did we travel down the hil and across the plain that we reached Kôr just as the sun was setting. As we crossed the moat I perceived old Billali coming to meet us. This he did with many bows, keeping an anxious eye upon the litter which he had learned contained Umslopo gaas. Indeed his attitude and that of all the Amahagge towards the two of us, and even Hans, thenceforward became almost abject, since after our victory over Rezu and his death beneath the axe, they looked upon us as half divinc and treated us accordingly.

'O mighty General,' he said. 'She-who-commands bids me conduct the lady who is sick to the place that has been made ready for her, which is near your own so that you may watch over her if you will."

I wondered how Ayesha knew that Inez was sick, but being too tired to ask questions, merely bade him lead on. This he did, taking us to another ruined house next to our own quarters which had been swept, cleaned and furnished after a fashion, and moreover cleverly roofed in with mats, so that it was really quite comfortable. Here we found two middle-aged women of a very superior type, who, Billali informed me, were by trade nurses of the sick. Having seen her laid upon her bed. I committed Inez to their charge, since the case was not one that I dared to try to doctor myself, not knowing what drug of the few I possessed should be administered to her Moreover Billali comforted me with the information that soon She-who-commands would visit her and make her well again, as she could do

I answered that I hoped so and went to our quarters where I found an excellent meal ready cooked and with it a stone flagon, of the contents of which Billali said we were all three to drink by the command of Ayesha, who declared that it would take away our wearness

I tried the stuff, which was pale yellow in colour like sherry and, for aught I knew, might be poison, to find it most comforting, though it did not seem to be very strong to the taste. Certainly, too, its effects were wonderful, since presently all my great weariness fell from me like a discarded cloak, and I found myself with a splendid appetite and feeling better and stronger than I had done for years. In short that drink was a 'cocktail' of the best, one of which I only wish.'

possessed the recipe, though Ayesha told me afterwards that it was distilled from quite harmless herbs and not in any sense a spirit.

Having discovered this, I gave some of it to Haus, also to Umslopogaas, who was with the wounded Zulus, who, we found, were progressing well towards complete recevery, and lastly to Goroko who also was worn out. On all of these the effect of that magical brew proved most satisfactory.

Then, having washed, I ate a splendid dinner, though in this respect Hans, who was seated on the ground nearby.

'Baas,' he said, 'things have gone very well with as when they might have gone very ill. The Bass Red-Beard is dead, which is a good thing, since a madman would have been difficult to look after, and a brain full of moonships is a bas companion for any one. Oh! without doubt he is better dead, though your reverend father the Predikant will have a hard job looking after him there in the Place of Fires."

'Perhaps:' I said with a sigh, 'since it is better to be dead than to live a lunatic. But what I fear is that the are is daughter will follow him.'

'Oh, no! Baas,' replied Hans cheerfully, Thattain I down say that she will always be a little mad also, because too sec it is in her blood and doubtless she has locked an incliful things. But the Great Medicine will see to it that she cases not die after we have taken so much trouble and some mis such big dangers to save her. That Great Medicine is verwonderful, Baas. First of all it makes you General over time Amahagger who without you would never have fourth as the Witch who ties up her head in a cloth knew well end and Then it brings us safe through the battle and sives seemen to Umslopogaas to kill the old man-eating siant

Why did it not give me strength to kill him. Hars! let him have two Express bullets on his chest warm in him no more than a tap upon the horns with a danger state would hurt a bull-buffalo.

'Oh! Baas, perhaps you missed him, who have the hit things sometimes, think that you do so aways

Having waited to see if I would rise to this piece of the solence, which of course I did not, he went on by say of letting me down easily, 'Or perhaps he wore very good acres under his beard, for I saw one of those A---pulled his hair off and cut him to pieces, go are looked like little bits of brass. Also the Great Menals that he should be killed by Umslopogaas and not by you, since otherwise Umslopogaas would have been sad for the rest of his life, whereas now he will walk about the world as proud as a cock with two tails and crow all night as well as all day. Then, Baas, when Rezu broke the square and the Amahagger began to run, without doubt it was the Great Medicine which changed their hearts and made them brave again, so that they charged at the right moment when they saw it going forward on your breast, and instead of being eaten up, ate up the cannibals.

'Indeed! I thought that the Lady who dwells yonder had something to do with that business. Did you see her, Hans?'

'Oh, yes! I saw her, Baas, and I think that without doubt she lifted the cloth from over her head and when the people of Rezu saw how ugly was the face beneath, it did frighten them a little. But doubtless the Great Medicine put that thought into her, also, for, Baas, what could a silly woman do in such a case? Did you ever know of any woman who was of any use in a battle, or for anything else except to nurse babies, and this one does not even do that, no doubt because, being so hideous under that sheet, no man can be found to marry her.'

Now I looked up by chance and in the light of the lamps saw Ayesha standing in the room, which she had entered through the open doorway, within six feet of Hans' back indeed

'Be sure Baas,' he went on, 'that this bundle of rags is nothing but a common old cheat who frightens people by pretending to be a spook, as, if she dared to say that it was she who made those stinking Amahagger charge, and not the Great Medicine of the Opener-of-Roads, I would tell her to her face.'

Now I was too paralysed to speak, and while I was reflecting that it was fortunate Ayesha did not understand Dutch, she moved a little so that one of the lamps behind her caused her shadow to fall on to the back of the squatting Hans and over it on to the floor beyond He saw it and stared at the distorted shape of the hooded head, then slowly screwed his neck round and looked upwards behind him.

For a moment he went on staring as though he were frozen, then uttering a wild yell, he scrambled to his feet, bolted out of the house and vanished into the night.

'It seems, Allan,' said Ayesha slowly, 'that yonder yellow ed ape of yours is very bold at throwing sticks when the th leopardess is not beneath the tree. But when she comes it is otherwise with him. Oh! make no excuse, for I know well that he was speaking ill things of me, because being curious, as apes are, he burns to learn what is behind my veil, and being simple, believes that no woman would hide her face unless its fashion were not pleasing to the nice taste of men.

Then, to my relief, she laughed a little, softly, which showed me that she had a sense of humour, and went on, 'Well, let him be, for he is a good ape and courageous in his fashion, as he showed when he went out to spy upon the host of Rezu, and stabbed the murderer-priest by the stone of sacrifice.'

'How can you know the words of Hans, Ayesha,' I asked 'seeing that he spoke in a tongue which you have never learned?'

'Perchance I read faces, Allan.'

'Or backs,' I suggested, remembering that his was turned to her.

'Or backs, or voices, or hearts. It matters little which, since read I do. But have done with such childish talk and ead me to this maiden who has been snatched from the claws of Rezu and a fate that is worse than death. Do you understand, Allan, that ere the demon Rezu took her to wife, the plan was to sacrifice her own father to her and then eat him as the woman with her was eaten, and before her eyes? Now the father is dead, which is well, as I think the little yellow man said to you—nay, start not, I read it from his back—since had he lived whose brain was rotted, he would have raved till his death's day. Better, therefore, that he should die like a man fighting against a foe unconquerable by all save one. But she still lives.'

'Aye, but mindless, Ayesha.'

'Which, in great trouble such as she has passed, is a blessed state, O Allan. Bethink you, have there not been days, aye, and months, in your own life when you would have rejoiced to sleep in mindlessness? And should we not, perchance, be happier, all of us, if like the beasts we could not remember, foreknow and understand? Oh! men talk of Heaven, but believe me, the real Heaven is one of dreamless sleep, since life-and wakefulness, however high their scale and on whatever star, mean struggle, which being so oft mistaken, must breed sorrow—or remorse that spoils all. Come now.'

So I preceded her to the next ruined house where we found lnez lying on the bed still clothed in her barbaric trappings, although the veil had been drawn from off her face. There she lay, wide-eyed and still, while the women watched her. Avesha looked at her a while, then said to me,

'So they tricked her out to be Ayesha's mock and image: and in time accepted by those barbarians as my very self. and even set the seals of royalty on her, and she pointed to the gold discs stamped with the likeness of the sun. Well. she is a fair maiden, white and gently bred, the first such that I have seen for many an age. Nor did she wish this trickery. Moreover she has taken no hurt; her soul has sunk deep into a sea of horror and that is all, whence doubtless it can be drawn again. Yet I think it best that for a while she should. remember naught, lest her brain break, as did her father's and therefore no net of mine shall drag her back to memory. Let that return gently in future days, and then of it not too much, for so shall all this terror become to her a void in which sad shapes move like shadows, and as shadows are soon forgot and gone, no more to be held than dreams by the awakening sense. Stand aside, Allan, and you women, leave us for a while."

I obeyed, and the women bowed and went. Then Ayesha drew up her veil, and knelt down by the bed of Inez, but in such a fashion that I could not see her face although I admit that I tried to do so I could see, however, that she set her lips against those of Inez and as I gathered by her motions, seemed to breathe into her lips. Also she lifted her hands and placing one of them upon the heart of Inez, for a minute or more swayed the other from side to side above her eyes, pausing at times to touch her upon the forehead with her finger-tips.

Presently linez stirred and sat up, whereon Ayesha took a vessel of milk which stood upon the floor and held it to her lips. Inez drank to the last drop, then sank on to the bed again. For a while longer Ayesha continued the motions of her hands, then let fall her veil and rose.

'Look, I have laid a spell upon her,' she said, beckoning to me to draw near

I did so and perceived that now the eyes of Inez were shut and that she seemed to be plunged in a deep and natural sleep.

'So she will remain for this night and the day which follows,' said Ayesha, 'and when she wakes it will be, I think, to believe herself once more a happy child. Not until she sees her home again will she find her womanhood, and then all this story will be forgotten by her. Of her father you must tell her that he died when you went out to hunt the riverbeasts together, and if she seeks for certain others, that they have gone away. But I think that she will ask little more hen she learns that he is dead, since I have laid that comand upon her soul.'

'Hypnotic suggestion,' thought I to myself, 'and I only hope heaven that it will work.'

Ayesha seemed to guess what was passing through my mind, or she nodded and said.

'Have no fear, Allan, for I am what the black axe-bearer nd the little yellow man call a "witch" which means, as ou who are instructed know, one who has knowledge of nedicine and other things and who holds a key to some of ac mysteries that lie hid in Nature.'

'For instance,' I suggested, 'of how to transport yourself ato a battle at the right moment, and out of it again-also

t the right moment.'

'Yes, Allan, since watching all from afar, I saw that those Amahagger curs were about to flee and that I was needed here to hearten them and to put fear into the army of Rezu. lo I came.'

'But how did you come, Ayesha?'

She laughed as she answered.

'Perhaps I did not come at all. Perhaps you all only thought I came: since I seemed to be there the rest matters nothing.'

As I still looked unconvinced she went on.

'Oh! foolish man, seek not to learn of that which is too high for you. Yet, listen. You in your ignorance suppose that the soul dwells within the body, do you not?'

I answered that I had always been under this impression. 'Yet. Allan, it is otherwise, for the body dwells within the soul.

'Like the pearl in an oyster,' I suggested.

'Aye, in a sense, since the pearl which to you is beautiful, is to the oyster a sickness and a poison, and so is the body to the soul whose temple it troubles and defiles. Yet round it is the white and holy soul that ever seeks to bring the vile body to its own purity and colour, yet oft-time fails. Learn, Allan, that flesh and spirit are the deadliest foes joined together by a high decree that they may forget their hate and perfect each other, or failing, be separate to all eternity, the spirit going to its own place and the flesh to its corruption.'

'A strange theory,' I said.

'Aye, Allan, and one which is so new to you that never will you understand it. Yet it is true and I set it out for this reason. The soul of man, being at liberty and not cooped within his narrow breast, is in touch with that soul of the Universe, which men know as God Whom they call by many names. Therefore it has all knowledge and perhaps all power, and at times the body within it, if it be a wise body, can draw from this well of knowledge and abounding power. So at least can I. And now you will understand why I am so good a doctoress and how I came to appear in the battle, as you said, at the right time, and to leave it when my work was done.

'Oh! yes,' I answered, 'I quite understand. I thank you much for putting it so plainly."

She laughed a little, appreciating my jest, looked at the sleeping Inez, and said.

The fair body of this lady dwells in a large soul, I think, though one of a somewhat sombre hue, for souls have their colours, Allan, and stain that which is within them. She will never be a happy woman.

'The black people named her Sad-Eyes,' I said.

'Is it so? Well, I name her Sad-Heart, though for such often there is joy at last. Meanwhile she will forget; yes, she will forget the worst and how narrow was the edge between her and the arms of Rezu?'

'Just the width of the blade of the axe, Inkosikaas,' I answered. 'But tell me, Ayesha, why could not that axe cut and why did my bullets flatten or turn aside when these smote the breast of Rezu.'

'Because his front-armour was good, Allan, I suppose,' she replied indifferently, and on his back he wore none.'

Then why did you fill my ears with such a different tale about that hornble giant having drunk of a Cup of Life, and all the rest? I asked with irritation.

'I have forgotten, Allan. Perhaps because the curious, such as you are, like to hear tales even stranger than their own, which in the days to be may become their own. Therefore you will be wise to believe only what I do, and of what I tell you, nothing.'

'I don't,' I exclaimed exasperated.

She laughed again and replied,

What need to say to me that which I know already? Yet perhaps in the future it may be different, since often by the alchemy of the mind the fables of our youth are changed into the facts of our age, and we come to believe in anything, as your little yellow man believes in some savage named Zikali, and those Amahagger believe in the talisman round your neck, and I who am the maddest of you all, believe in Love and Wisdom, and the black warrior, Umslopogaas, believes in the virtue of that great axe of his, rather than in those of his own courage and of the strength that wields it. Fools, every one of us, though perchance I am the greatest fool among them. Now take me to the warrior Umslopogaas, whom I would thank, as I thank you, Allan, and the little yellow man. although he jeers at me with his sharp tongue, not knowing that if I were angered, with a breath I could cause him to cease to be.'

Then why did you not cause Rezu to cease to be, and his army also, Ayesha?'

'It seems that I have done these things through the axe of Umslopogaas and by help of your generalship, Allan. Why, then, waste my own strength when yours lay to my hand?'

Because you had no power over Rezu, Ayesha, or so you told me.'

'Have I not said that my words are like snowflakes, meant to melt and leave no trace, hiding my thoughts as this veil hides my beauty? Yet as the beauty is becaute the veil. perchance there is truth beneath the votes, though not that truth you think. So you are well assessed and for the rest, I wonder whether Rezu thought I had no power over him when yonder on the mountain sput he say the float down upon his companies like a spin of the min well perchance some day I shall learn this and many offer theres.

I made no answer, since where wer the rest of energy with a woman who told me trails that II the said was false. At that time I have heard there was a question of wa between the worshippers of Lulala and the grandfather c Rezu. But this Zikali told the People of Lulala that the must not fight the People of Rezu until in a day to come white man should visit Kôr and bring with him a piece c wood on which was cut the image of a dwarf like to tha Zikali himself. Then and not before they must fight and con quer the People of Rezu. Now this story came down amon them and you who may have thought the first tale magica will understand it in its simplicity: Is it not so, you wis Allan?

'Oh! yes.' I answered, 'except that I do not see how Zikal can have come here a hundred years ago, since men do not liv as long, although he pretends to have done so."

'No Allan, nor do I, but perhaps it was his father, o his grandfather who came, since being observant, you wil have noted that if the parent is mis-formed, so often are the descendants; also that the pretence of wizardry at times come down with the blood.

Again I made no answer for I saw that Ayesha was fooling me, and before she could exhaust that amusement we reached the place where Umslopogaas and his men were gathered round a camp five. He sat silent, but Goroko with mucl animation was telling the story of the fight in picturesque and coloured language, or that part of it which he had seen, for the benefit of the two wounded men who took no share in it and who, lying on their blankets with heads thrust forward were listening with eagerness to the entrancing tale. Suddenly they caught sight of Ayesha, and those of the party who could stand sprang to their feet, while one and all they gave her the royal salute of Bayète.

She waited till the sound had died away. Then she said 'I come to thank you and your men. O Wielder of the Axe who have shown yourself very great in battle, and to say to you that my Spirit tells me that every one of you, yes, ever those who are still sick, will come safe to your own land again and live out your years with honour.'

Again they saluted at this pleasing intelligence, when I had translated it to them, for of course they knew no Arabic

Then she went on,

'I am told, Umslopogaas. Son of the Lion, as a certain king was named in your land, that the fight you made agains

Rezu was a very great fight, and that such a leap as your above his head when you smote him with the axe on the himse parts where he wore no armour, and brought him to his death, has not been seen before, nor will be again.'

I rendered the words, and Umslopogaas, preferring tonic to modesty, replied emphatically that this was the case.

'Because of that fight and that leap,' Ayesha went on, 78 for other deeds that you have done and will do, my Same tells me that your name will live in story for many sensors tions. Yet of what use is fame to the dead? Therefore I make you an offer. Bide here with me and you shall rule these Amahagger, and with them the remnant of the People of Remain Your cattle shall be countless and your wives the fairest in the land, and your children many, for I will lift a certain curse from off you so that no more shall you be childless. Do you accept, O Holder of the Axe?'

When he understood, Umslopogaas, after pondering a moment, asked if I meant to stay in this land and marry the white chieftainess who spoke such wise words and could arpear and disappear in the battle at her will, and like a mountain-top hid her head in a cloud, which was his way of alluding to her veil.

I answered at once and with decision that I intended to do nothing of the sort and immediately regretted my words, since, although I spoke in Zulu, I suppose she read their meaning from my face. At any rate she understood the drift of

'Tell him, Allan,' she said with a kind of icy politeness. 'that you will not stop here and marry me, because if ever I chose a husband he would not be a little man at the doors of whose heart so many women's hands have knocked-ves. even those that are black-and not, I think, in vain. One, moreover, who holds himself so clever that he believes he has nothing left to learn, and in every flower of truth that is shown to him, however fair, smells only poison, and beneath nurturing it, sees only the gross root of falsehood planted in corruption. Tell him these things, Allan, if it pleases you.'

'It does not please me,' I answered in a rage at her insults. 'Nor is it needful, Allan, since if I caught the meaning of that barbarous tongue you use aright, you have told him already. Well, let the jest pass, O man who least of all things desires to be Ayesha's husband, and whom Ayesha least of all things desires as her spouse, and ask the Axe-bearer nothing since I perceive that without you he will not stay at Kôr. Nor indeed is it fated that he should do so, for now my Spirit tells me what it hid from me when I spoke a moment gone, that this warrior will die in a great fight far away and that between then and now much sorrow waits him who save that of one, knows not how to win the love of women. Let him say moreover what reward he desires since if I can give it to him, it shall be his.'

Again I translated. Umslopogaas received her prophecies in stoical silence and as I thought with indifference, and only said in reply.

'The glory that I have won is my reward and the only boon I seek at this queen's hands is that if she can she should, give me sight of a woman for whom my heart is hungry, and with it knowledge that this woman lives in that land whither I travel like all men.'

When she heard these words Ayesha said,

'True, I had forgotten. Your heart also is hungry, I think, Allan, for the vision of sundry faces that you see no more. Well, I will do my best, but since only faith fulfils itself, how can I who must strive to pierce the gates of darkness for one so unbelieving, know that they will open at my word? Come to me, both of you, at the sunset to-morrow.'

Then as though to change the subject, she talked to me for a long while about Kôr, of which she told me a most interesting history, true or false, that I omit here.

At length, as though suddenly she had grown tired, waving her hand to show that the conversation was ended, Ayesha went to the wounded men and touched them each in tirn.

'Now they will recover swiftly,' she said, and leaving the place was gone into the darkness.

THE GATE OF DEATH

rore turning in I examined these wounded men for myself. e truth is that I was anxious to learn their exact condition order that I make an estimate as to when it would be ssible for us to leave this valley or crater bottom of Kôr, which I was heartily tired. Who could desire to stay in a new where he had not only been involved in a deal of hard, ubtful, and very dangerous fighting from which all personal erest was absent, but where also he was meshed in a perfect der's web of bewilderment, and exposed to continual insult o the bargain?

For that is what it came to; this Ayesha took every oprtunity to jeer at and affront me. And why? Just because had conceived doubts, which somehow she discovered, of e amazing tales with which it had amused her to stuff e, as a farmer's wife does a turkey poult with meal pellets. ow could she expect me, a man, after all, of some exrience, to believe such lies, which, not half an hour before. the coolest possible fashion she had herself admitted to be is and nothing else, told for the mere pleasure of romancing? The immortal Rezu, for instance, who had drunk of the up of Life er some such rubbish, now turned out to be othing but a brawny savage descended from generations of niels also called Rezu. Moreover the immemorial Ayesha, ho also had drunk of Cups of Life, and according to her rst story, had lived in this place for thousands of years, had ome here with a mother, who filled the same mystic rôle refore her for the benefit of an extremely gloomy and disigreeable tribe of Semitic savages. Yet she was cross with me recause I had not swallowed her crude and indigential ture of fable and philosophy without a moment's mention

At least I supposed that this was the reason possible explanation did come into my to be duly overcome by her change of the pressed, for who could be beauty even for a moment of the pressed. I had at less attributes the pressed of the pressed of and learned what it is best to leave alone. Perhaps this had annoved her, especially as no white man seemed to have come her way for a long while and the fabulous Kallikrates had not put in his promised appearance.

Also it was unfortunate that in one way or another how did she do it, I wondered-she had interpreted Umslonogans' question to me about marrying her, and my compromising reply. Not that for one moment, as I saw very clearly, did she wish to marry me. But that fact, intuition suggested to my mind, did not in the least prevent her from being angry because I shared her views upon this important subject.

Oh! the whole thing was a bore and the sooner I saw the last of that veiled lady and the interesting but wearisome ruins in which she dwelt, the better I should be pleased, although apparently I must trek homewards with a poor young woman who was out of her mind, leaving the bones of her unfortunate father behind me. I admitted to myself, however, that there were consolations in the fact that Providence had thus decreed, for Robertson since he gave up drink had not been a cheerful companion, and two mad people would really have been more than I could manage.

To return, for these reasons I examined the two wounded Zulus with considerable anxiety, only to discover another instance of the chicanery which it amused this Avesha to play off upon me. For what did I find? That they were practically well. Their hurts, which had never been serious, had healed wonderfully in that pure air, as those of savages have a way of doing, and they told me themselves that they felt quite strong again. Yet with colossal impudence Ayesha had managed to suggest to my mind that she was going to work some remarkable cure upon them, who were already cured.

Well, it was of a piece with the rest of her conduct and there was nothing to do except go to bed, which I did with much gratitude that my resting place that night was not of another sort. The last thing I remember was wondering how on earth Avesha appeared and disappeared in the course of that battle, a problem as to which I could find no solution, though, as in the case of the others, I was sure that one would occur to me in course of time

I slept like a top, so soundly indeed that I think there was some kind of soporific in the pick-me-up which looked like sherry, especially as the others who had drunk of it also passed an excellent night.

About ten o'clock on the following morning I awoke feeling particularly well and quite as though I had been enjoying a week at the seaside instead of my recent adventures, which included an abominable battle and some agonising moments during which I thought that my number was up upon the board of Destiny.

I spent the most of that day lounging about, eating talking over the details of the battle with Umslopogaas and the Zulus and smoking more than usual. If forgot to say that these Amahagger grew some capital tookens of which I had obtained a supply, although like most Africans, they only used it in the shape of south. The truth was that after any marvellings and acute anxieties, also mental and plantage exertions, I felt like the housemaid who maned in he are used to be completely idle and various and acute any least a beautiful and the say that all I have that all I may that all I have that all I ha had earned in the battle.

Hearing this, Umslopognas and the other Zulus said that they would like to see this review if I would accompany them. Although I did not want to go nor indeed desired ever to look at another Amahagger, I consented to save the trouble of argument, on condition that we should do so from a distance.

So including the wounded men, we strolled off and presently came to the crumbled wall of the old city, beyond which lay the great moat now dry, that once had encircled it with water.

Here on the top of this wall we sat down where we could see without being seen, and observed the Amahagger companies, considerably reduced during the battle, being marshalled by their captains beneath us and about a couple of hundred yards away. Also we observed several groups of men under guard. These we took to be prisoners captured in the fight with Rezu, who, as Hans remarked with a smack of his lips, were probably awaiting sacrifice

I said I hoped not and vawned, for really the afternoon was intensely hot and the weather most peculiar. The sun had vanished behind clouds, and vapours filled the still air, so dense that at times it grew almost dark; also when these cleared for brief intervals, the landscape in the grey unholy light looked distorted and unnatural, as it does during an eclipse of the sun.

Goroko, the witch-doctor, stared round him, sniffed the air and then remarked oracularly that it was 'wizard's weather' and that there were many spirits about. Upon my word I felt inclined to agree with him, for my feelings were very uncomfortable, but I only replied that if so, I should be obliged if he, as a professional, would be good enough to keep them off me. Of course I knew that electrical charges were about, which accounted for my sensations, and wished that I had never left the camp

It was during one of these periods of dense gloom that Ayesha must have arrived upon the review ground. At least when it lifted, there she was in her white garments, surrounded by women and guards, engaged apparently in making an oration, for although I could not hear a word, I could see by the motions of her arms that she was speaking.

Had she been the central figure in some stage scene, no limelights could have set her off to better advantage, than did those of the heavens above her. Suddenly, through the blanket of cloud, flowing from a hole in it that looked like an eye, came a blood-red ray which fell full upon her, so that she alone was fiercely visible whilst all around uses along the plant the ville h shapes moved dimly. Certainly the lanked stolling and my men terrifying in that red ray which stained her robe fill I who had had just come out of battle with its continsed thisse, heading ink of the garments rolled in blood of which I offig in my favourite Old Testament, For orimson was she head to foot; a tall shape of terror and of wrath.

e eye in heaven shut and the ray went out. Then came of the spaces of grey light and in it I saw men being ght up, apparently from the groups of prisoners, under i, and, to the number of a dozen or more, stood in a line e Avesha.

en I saw nothing more for a long while, because blackseemed to flow in from every quarter of the heavens and ock out the scene beneath. At last after a pause of perfive minutes, during which the stillness was intense, the i broke.

was a very curious storm; in all my experience of an tempests I cannot recall one which it resembled. It n with the usual cold and wailing wind. This died away, suddenly the whole arch of heaven was alive with little nings that seemed to strike horizontally, not downwards ie earth, weaving a web of fire upon the surface of the the illumination of these lightnings which, but for the ness of their flashing and greater intensity, somewhat nbled a dense shower of shooting stars, I perceived that sha was addressing the men that had been brought before who stood dejectedly in a long line with their heads bent. e unattended, since their guards had fallen back,

I were going to receive a reward of cattle or wives, I ald look happier than those moon-worshippers. Baas,' reked Hans reflectively.

'erhaps it would depend." I answered, 'upon what the cattle wives were like. If the cattle had red-water and would ig disease into your herd, or wild bulls that would gore 1, and the wives were skinny old widows with evil tongues, n I think you would look as do those men, Hans.'

don't quite know what made me speak thus, but I believe was some sense of pending death or disaster, suggested, obably, by the ominous character of the setting provided by ature to the curious drama of which we were witnesses.

I never thought of that, Baas," commented Hans, 'but is true that all gifts are not good, especially witches' gifts."

As he spoke the little net-like lightnings died away, leaving behind them a gross darkness through which, far above us, the wind wailed again.

Then suddenly all the heaven was turned into one blaze of light, and by it I saw Ayesha standing tall and rigid with her hand pointed towards the line of men in front of her. The blaze went out, to be followed by blackness, and to return almost instantly in a yet fiercer blaze which seemed to fall earthwards in a torrent of fire that concentrated itself in a kind of flame-spout upon the spot where Ayesha stood.

Through that flame or rather in the heart of it, I saw Ayesha and the file of men in front of her, as the great King saw the prophets in the midst of the furnace that had been heated sevenfold. Only these men did not walk about in the fire; no, they fell backwards, while Ayesha alone remained upon her feet with outstretched hand.

Next came more blackness and crash upon crash of such thunder that the earth shook as it reverberated from the mountain cliffs. Never in my life did I hear such fearful thunder. It frightened the Zulus so much, that they fell upon their faces, except Goroko and Umslopogaas, whose pride kept them upon their feet, the former because he had a reputation to preserve as a 'Heaven-herd,' or Master of tempests

I confess that I should have liked to follow their example, and lie down, being dreadfully afraid lest the lightning should strike me But there-I did not

At last the thunder died away and in the most mysterious fashion that violent tempest came to a sudden end, as does a storm upon the stage. No rain fell, which in itself was surprising enough and most unusual, but in place of it a garment of the completest calm descended upon the earth. By degrees, too, the darkness passed and the westering sun reappeared. Its rays fell upon the place where the Amahagger companies had stood, but now not one of them was to be seen.

They were all gone and Ayesha with them. So completely had they vanished away that I should have thought that we suffered from illusions, were it not for the line of dead men which lay there looking very small and lonesome on the veld; mere dots indeed at that distance.

We stared at each other and at them, and then Goroko said that he would like to inspect the bodies to learn whether lightning killed at Kôr as it did elsewhere, also whether it had smitten them altogether or least from man to man. This, a professional 'Heaven-herd,' he declared he could tell. n the marks upon these unfortunates.

s I was curious also and wanted to make a few observais, I consented. So with the exception of the wounded 1, who I thought should avoid the exertion, we scrambled vn the débris of the tumbled wall and across the open ce beyond, reaching the scene of the tragedy without meetor seeing anyone.

here lay the dead, eleven of them, in an exact line as they stood. They were all upon their backs with widelyned eves and an expression of great fear frozen upon their es. Some of these I recognised, as did Umslopogaas and is. They were soldiers or captains who had marched under to attack Rezu, although until this moment I had not seen of them after we began to descend the ridge where the tle took place.

Baas,' said Hans, 'I believe that these were the traitors slipped away and told Rezu of our plans so that he cked us on the ridge, instead of our attacking him on plain as we had arranged so nicely. At least they were e of them in the battle and afterwards I heard the Ama-

remarked that if so the lightning had discriminated very I in this instance.

leanwhile Goroko was examining the bodies one by one. I presently called out.

These doomed ones died not by lightning but by witchcraft. ere is not a burn upon one of them, nor are their garments rched.'

went to look and found that it was perfectly true; to all ward appearance the eleven were quite unmarked and narmed. Except for their frightened air, they might have d a natural death in their sleep.

Does lightning always scorch?' I asked Goroko.

Always, Macumazahn,' he answered, 'that is, if he who s been struck is killed, as these are, and not only stunned. preover, most of yonder dead wear knives which should ve been melted or shattered with the sheaths burnt off them. t those knives are as though they had just left the smith's mmer and the whet-stone,' and he drew some of them to Again it was quite true and here I may remark that my perience tallied with that of Goroko, since I have never en anyone killed by lightning on whom or on whose clothing there was not some trace of its passage.

'Ow!' said Umslopogaas, 'this is witchcraft, no.' Heaver wrath. The place is enchanted. Let us get away lest we be smitten also who have not earned doom like those traitors

'No need to fear,' said Hans, 'since with us is the Gree Medicine of Zikali which can tie up the lightning as an ol woman does a bundle of sticks.'

Still I observed that for all his confidence, Hans himse was the first to depart and with considerable speed. So went back to our camp without more conversation, since the Zulus were scared and I confess that myself I could not under stand the matter, though no doubt it admitted of some quit simple explanation.

However that might be, this Kor was a queer place wit its legends, its sullen Amahagger and its mysterious queer to whom at times, in spite of my inner conviction to the contrary, I was still inclined to attribute powers beyon those that are common even among very beautiful and abl

This reflection reminded me that she had promised us further exhibition of those powers and within an hour or two Remembering this I began to regret that I had ever asked fo any such manifestations, for who knew what these might o might not involve?

So much did I regret it that I determined, unless Ayesh sent for us, as she had said she would do, I would convenient forget the appointment. Luckily Umslopogaas seemed to b of the same way of thinking; at any rate he went off the eat his evening meal without alluding to it at all. So I mad up my mind that I would not bring the matter to his notic and having ascertained that Inez was still asleep, I followe his example and dined myself, though without any particula appetite.

As I finished the sun was setting in a perfectly clear sky so as there was no sign of any messenger, I thought that would go to bed early, leaving orders that I was not to b disturbed. But on this point my luck was lacking, for just a I had taken off my coat, Hans arrived and said that old Billali was without and had come to take me somewhere.

Well, there was nothing to do but put it on again, Befor I had finished this operation Billali himself arrived with un dignified and unusual haste. I asked him what was the matter, and he answered inconsequently that the Black One the slayer of Rezu, was at the door 'with his axe.'

For a while she sat still in her chair contemplating us both. Then she said,

'How comes it that you are late? Those that seek their lost loves should run with eager feet, but yours have tarried.'

I muttered some excuse to which she did not trouble to listen, for she went on,

'I think, Allan, that your sandals, which should be winged like to those of the Roman Mercury, are weighted with the grey lead of fear. Well, it is not strange, since you have come to travel through the Gates of Death that are feared by all, even by Ayesha's self, for who knows what he may find beyond them? Ask the Axe-Bearer if he also is afraid.'

I obeyed, rendering all that she had said into the Zulu idiom as best I could.

'Say to the Queen, answered Umslopogaas, when he understood, 'that I fear nothing, except women's tongues. I am' ready to pass the Gates of Death and, if need be, to come back no more. With the white people I know it is otherwise because of some dark teachings to which they listen, that tell of terrors to be, such as we who are black do not dread. Still, we believe that there are ghosts and that the spirits of our fathers live on and as it chances I would learn whether this is so, who above all things desire to meet a certain ghost, for which reason I journeyed to this far land.

'Say these things to the White Queen Macumazahn, and tell her that if she should send me to a place whence there is no return. I who do not love the world, shall not blame her overmuch, though it is true that I should have chosen to die in war Now I have spoken'

When I had passed on all this speech to Ayesha, her comment on it was.

'This black Capt in has a spirit as brave as his body, but how is it with your spirit. Allan' Are you also prepared to risk so much? Learn that I can promise you nothing, save that when I loose the bonds of your mortality and send out your soul to wander in the depths of Death, as I believe that I can do, though even of this I am not certain—you must pass through a gate of terrors that may be closed behind you by a stronger arm than mine. Moreover, what you will find beyond it I do not know, since be sure of this, each of us has his own heaven or his own hell, or both, that soon or late he is doomed to travel. Now will you go forward, or go back? Make choice, while there is still time.'

At all this ominous talk I felt my heart shrivel like a fire-

THE LESSON

'YES,' answered Ayesha, laughing very softly, 'for that purpose alone, O truth-seeking Allan, whose curiosity is so fierce that the wide world cannot hold it, did you come to Kôr and not to seek wealth or new lands, or to fight more savages. No, not even to look upon a certain Ayesha, of whom the old wizard told you, though I think that you have always loved to try to lift the veil that hides women's hearts, if not their faces. Yet it was I who brought you to Kôr for my own purposes, not your desire, nor Zikali's map and talisman, since had not the white lady who lies sick been stolen by Rezu, never would you have made the journey nor found the way hither.'

'How could you have had anything to do with that business?' I asked testily, for my nerves were on edge and I said the first thing that came into my mind.

That, Allan, is a question over which you will wonder for a long while either beneath or beyond the sun, as you will wonder concerning much that has to do with me, which your little mind, shut in its iron box of ignorance and pride, cannot understand to-day

'For example, you have been wondering, I am sure, how the lightning killed those eleven men whose bodies you went to look on an hour or two ago, and left the rest untouched. Well, I will tell you at once that it was not lightning that killed them, although the strength within me was manifest to you in storm, but rather what that witch-doctor of your following called wizardry. Because they were traitors who betrayed your army to Rezu, I killed them with my wrath and by the wand of my power. Oh! you do not believe, yet perhaps ere long you will, since thus to fulfil your prayer I must also kill you—almost. That is the trouble, Allan. To kill you outright would be easy, but to kill you just enough to set your spirit free and yet leave one crevice of mortal life through which it can creep back again, that is most difficult a thing that only I can do and even of myself I am not sure.

'Pray do not try the experiment-' I began, thoroughl alarmed, but she cut me short.

Disturb me no more, Allan, with the tremors and change of your uncertain mind, lest you should work more evil than you think, and making mine uncertain also, spoil my skill, Nay, do not try to fly, for already the net has thrown itself about you and you cannot stir, who are bound like a little gilded wasp in the spider's web, or like birds beneath the eyes of basilisks.

This was true, for I found that, strive as I would, I could not move a limb or even an eyelid. I was frozen to that spot and there was nothing for it except to curse my folly and say

All this while she went on talking, but of what she said I have not the faintest idea, because my remaining wits were absorbed in these much-needed implorations.

Presently, of a sudden, I appeared to see Ayesha seated in a temple, for there were columns about her, and behind her was an altar on which a fire burned. All round her, too, were e---led snakes like to that she wore about her middle. aned in gold. To these snakes she sang and they danced r singing; ves, with flickering tongues they danced upon tails! What the scene signified I cannot conceive. unless eant this mistress of magic was consulting her familiars. en that vision vanished and Ayesha's voice began to very far away and dreamy, also her wondrous beauty me visible to me through her veil, as though I had aced a new sense that overcame the limitations of mortal . Even in this extremity I reflected it was well that the last I looked on should be something so glorious. No. not the last thing, for out of the corners of my eyes I saw Umslopogaas from a sitting position had sunk on to his. ; and lay, apparently dead, with his axe still gripped lly and held above his head, as though his arm had been ed to ice.

fter this terrible things began to happen to me and I ame aware that I was dying. A great wind seemed to th me up and blow me to and fro, as a leaf is blown in the ies of a winter gale. Enormous rushes of darkness flowed r me, to be succeeded by vivid bursts of brightness that zled like lightning. I fell off precipices and at their foot s caught by some fearful strength and tossed to the skies. From those skies I was hurled down again into a kind of irlpool of inky night, round which I spun perpetually, as it emed for hours and hours. But worst of all was the awful neliness from which I suffered. It seemed to me as though there were no other living thing in all the Universe and never had been and never would be any other living thing. I felt as though I were the Universe rushing solitary through space for ages upon ages in a frantic search for fellowship, and finding none.

Then something seemed to grip my throat and I knew that

Now fear and every mortal sensation left me, to be replaced by a new and spiritual terror. I, or rather my disembodied consciousness, seemed to come up for judgment, and the horror of it was that I appeared to be my own judge. There, a very embodiment of cold justice, my Spirit, grown luminous, sat upon a throne and to it, with dread and merciless particularity I set out all my misdeeds. It was as if some part of me remained mortal, for I could see my two eyes, my mouth and my hands, but nothing else—and strange enough they looked. From the eyes came tears, from the mouth flowed words and the hands were joined, as though in prayer to that throned and adamantine Spirit which was ME.

It was as though this Spirit were asking how my body had served its purposes and advanced its mighty ends, and in reply—oh! what a miserable tale I had to tell. Fault upon fault, weakness upon weakness, sin upon sin: never before did I understand how black was my record. I tried to relieve the picture with some incidents of attempted good, but that Spirit would not hearken It seemed to say that it had gathered up the good and knew it all. It was of the evil that it would learn, not of the good that had bettered it, but of the evil by which it had been harmed.

Hearing this there rose up in my consciousness some memory of what Ayesha had said: namely, that the body lived within the temple of the spirit which it oft defiled, and not the spirit in the body

The story was told and I hearkened for the judgment, my own judgment on myself, which I knew would be accepted without question and registered for good or ill. But none came, since ere the balance sank this way or that, ere it could be uttered, I was swept afar.

Through Infinity I was swept, and as I fled faster than the light, the meaning of what I had seen came home to me. I knew, or seemed to know for the first time, that at the last man must answer to himself, or perhaps to a divine principle within himself, that out of his own free-will, through long acons and by a million steps, he climbs or sinks to the heights or depths dormant in his nature; that from what he was, .. springs what he is, and what he is, engenders what he shall be for ever and ave.

Now I envisaged Immortality and splendid and awful was its face. It clasped me to its breast and in the vast circle of its arms I was up-borne, I who knew myself to be without beginning and without end, and yet of the past and of the future knew nothing, save that these were full of mysteries.

As I went I encountered others, or overtook them, making the same journey. Robertson swept past me, and spoke, but in a tongue I could not understand. I noted that the madness had left his eyes and that his fine-cut features were calm and spiritual. The other wanderers I did not know.

I came into a region of blinding light; the thought rose in me that I must have reached the sun, or a sun, though I felt no heat. I stood in a lovely, shining valley about which burned mountains of fire. There were huge trees in that valley, but they glowed like gold and their flowers and fruit were as though they had been fashioned of many-coloured flames.

The place was glorious beyond compare, but very strange to me and not to be described. I sat me down upon a boulder which burned like a ruby, whether with heat or colour I do not know, by the edge of a stream that flowed with what looked like fire and made a lovely music. I stooped and drank of this water of flames and the scent and the taste of it were as those of the costliest wine.

There, beneath the spreading limbs of a fire-tree I sat. and examined the strange flowers that grew around, coloured like rich jewels and perfumed above imagining. There were birds also which might have been feathered with sapphires, rubies and amethysts, and their song was so sweet that I could have wept to hear it. The scene was wonderful and filled me with exaltation, for I thought of the land where it is promised that there shall be no more night.

People began to appear; men, women, and even children, though whence they came I could not see. They did not fly and they did not walk; they seemed to drift towards me, as unguided boats drift upon the tide. One and all they were very beautiful, but their beauty was not human although their shapes and faces resembled those of men and women made glorious. None were old, and except the children, none seemed very young, it was as though they had grown backwards or

Now came the marvel; all these uncounted people were known to me, though so far as my knowledge went I had never set eyes on most of them before. Yet I was aware that in some forgotten life or epoch I had been intimate with every one of them; also that it was the fact of my presence and the call of my sub-conscious mind which drew them to this spot. Yet that presence and that call were not visible or audible to them, who, I suppose, flowed down some stream of sympathy, why or whither they did not know. Had I been as they were perchance they would have seen me, as it was they saw nothing and I could not speak and tell them of my presence.

Some of this multitude, however, I knew well enough even when they had departed years and years ago. But about these I noted this, that every one of them was a man or woman or a child for whom I had felt love or sympathy or friendship. Not one was a person whom I had disliked or whom I had no wish to see again. If they spoke at all I could not hearor read—their speech, yet to a certain extent I could hear. their thoughts.

Many of these were beyond the power of my appreciation on subjects of which I had no knowledge, or that were too high for me, but some were of quite simple things such as concern us upon earth, such as of friendship, or learning, or journevs made or to be made, or art, or literature, or the wonders of Nature, or of the fruits of the earth, as they knew them in this region.

This I noted too, that each separate thought seemed to be hallowed and enclosed in an atmosphere of prayer or heavenly aspiration, as a seed is enclosed in the heart of a flower, or a fruit in its odorous rind, and that this prayer or aspiration. presently appeared to bear the thought away, whither I knew not. Moreover, all these thoughts, even of the humblest things, were beauteous and spiritual, nothing cruel or impure or even coarse was to be found among them: they radiated charity, purity and goodness

Among them I perceived were none that had to do with our earth; this and its affairs seemed to be left far behind. these thinkers, a truth that chilled my soul which was alien to. their company. Worse still, so far as I could discover, although I knew that all these bright ones had been near to me at some hour in the measurements of time and space, not one of their musings dwelt upon me or on aught with which I had ... to do.

Between me and them there was a great gulf fixed and a

Oh, look! One came shining like a star, and from far away came another with dove-like eyes and beautiful exaway came unout this last a maiden, whose eyes were as hers who my heart told me was her mother.

Well, I knew them both; they were those whom I had come to seek, the women who had been mine upon the earth, and at the sight of them my spirit thrilled. Surely they would discover me. Surely at least they would speak of me and feel my presence.

But, although they stayed within a pace or two of where I rested, alas! it was not so. They seemed to kiss and to exchange swift thoughts about many things, high things of hich I will not write, and common things; yes, even of the nining robes they wore, but never a one of me! I strove to se and go to them, but could not; I strove to speak and ould not; I strove to throw out my thought to them and ould not; it fell back upon my head like a stone hurled eavenward.

They were remote from me, utterly apart. I wept tears of pitterness that I should be so near and yet so far; a dull and jealous rage burned in my heart, and this they did seem to feel, or so I fancied; at any rate, apparently by mutual consent, they moved further from me as though something pained them. Yes, my love could not reach their perfected natures, but my anger hurt them.

As I sat chewing this root of bitterness, a man appeared, a very noble man, in whom I recognised my father grown younger and happier-looking, but still my father, with whom came others, men and women whom I knew to be my brothers and sisters who had died in youth far away in Oxfordshire. Joy leapt up in me, for I thought—these will surely know me and give me welcome, since, though here sex has lost its power, blood still must call to blood.

But it was not so. They spoke, or interchanged their thoughts, but not one of me. I read something that passed from my father to them. It was a speculation as to what had brought them all together there, and read also the answer hazarded, that perhaps it might be to give welcome to some unknown who was drawing near from below and would feel lonely and unfriended. Thereon my father replied that he did not see or feel this wanderer, and thought that it could not be so, since it was his mission to greet such on their coming.

Then in an instant all were gone and that lovely, glowing plain was empty, save for myself seated on the ruby-like stone weeping tears of blood and shame and loss within my soul.

So I sat a long while, till presently I was aware of a new presence, a presence dusky and splendid and arrayed in rich barbaric robes. Straight she came towards me, like a throwr spear, and I knew her for a certain royal and savage womar who on earth was named Mameena, or 'Wind-that-wailed. Moreover she divined me, though see me she could not

Art there. Watcher-in-the-Night, watching in the light? she said or thought, I know not which, but the words came to me in the Zulu tongue.

'Aye,' she went on, 'I know that thou art there; from ten thousand leagues away I felt thy presence and broke from my own place to welcome thee, though I must pay for it with burning chains and bondage. How did those welcome their whom thou camest out to seek? Did they clasp thee in their arms and press their kisses on thy brow? Or did they shrink away from thee because the smell of earth was on thy hand and lips?'

I seemed to answer that they did not appear to know that I was there.

Aye, they did not know because their love is not enough because they have grown too fine for love. But I, the sinner I knew well, and here am I ready to suffer all for thee and to give thee place within this stormy heart of mine. Forget them then, and come to rule with me who still am queen in my own house that thou shalt share. There we will live royally and when our hour comes, at least we shall have had our day.

Now before I could reply, some power seemed to seize this splendid creature and whirl her thence so that she departed flashing these words from her mind to mine,

'For a little while farewell, but remember always tha Mameena, the Wailing Wind, being still as a sinful woman with a woman's love and of the earth, earthy, found thee whom all the rest forgot. O Watcher-in-the-Night, watch in the night for me, for thou shalt find me, the Child of Storm again, and yet again.

She was gone and once more I sat in utter solitude upor that ruby stone, staring at the jewelled flowers and the gloriou flaming trees and the lambent waters of the brook. Wha was the meaning of it all, I wondered, and why was I deserted by everyone save a single savage woman, and why had she:

nower to find me which was denied to all the rest? Well, she had given me an answer, because she was 'as a sinful woman with a woman's love and of the earth, earthy,' while with the rest it was otherwise. Oh! this was clear, that in the heavens man has no friend among the heavenly, save perhaps the greatest Friend of all Who understands both flesh and spirit.

Thus I mused in this burning world which was still so beautiful, this alien world into which I had thrust myself unwanted and unsought. And while I mused this happened. The fiery waters of the stream were disturbed by something and looking up I saw the cause.

A dog had plunged into them and was swimming towards me. At a glance I knew that dog on which my eyes had not fallen for decades. It was a mongrel, half spaniel and half bull-terrier, which for years had been the dear friend of my vouth and died at last on the horns of a wounded wildebeeste that attacked me when I had fallen from my horse upon the veld. Boldly it tackled the maddened buck, thus giving me time to scramble to my rifle and shoot it, but not before the poor hound had yielded its life for mine, since presently it died disembowelled, but licking my hand and forgetful of its agonies. This dog, Smut by name, it was that swam or seemed to swim the brook of fire. It scrambled to the hither shore, it nosed the earth and ran to the ruby stone and stared about it whining and sniffing.

At last it seemed to see or feel me, for it stood upon its hind legs and licked my face, yelping with mad joy, as I could see though I heard nothing. Now I wept in earnest and bent down to hug and kiss the faithful beast, but this I could not do, since like myself it was only shadow.

Then suddenly all dissolved in a cataract of many coloured flames and I fell down into an infinite guif of Macaness.

Surely Ayesha was talking to me! What all she say? What did she say? I could not catch her words but I must her laughter and knew that after her fashion she was making a mock of me. My eyelids were dragged down as though with heavy sleep; it was difficult to lift them it is the tree open and I saw Ayesha seated on her court setters are 255this I noted at once—with her lovely face about me, seeking Umslopogaas and Hans. But the seeking Umslopogaas and Hans. as I guessed they must be, since otherwise not have been unveiled. We were quite aims Se se se dressing me and in a new fashion, since now she had abandoned the formal 'you' and was using the more impressive and intimate 'thou,' much as is the manner of the French.

'Thou hast made thy journey, Allan,' she said, 'and what thou hast seen there thou shalt tell me presently. Yet from thy mien I gather this—that thou art glad to look upon flesh and blood again and, after the company of spirits, to find that of mortal woman. Come then and sit beside me and tell thy tale.'

'Where are the others?' I asked as I rose slowly to obey, for my head swam and my feet seemed feeble.

'Gone, Allan, who as I think have had enough of ghosts, which is perhaps thy case also. Come, drink this and be a man once more. Drink it to me whose skill and power have brought thee safe from lands that human feet were never meant to tread,' and taking a strange-shaped cup from a stool that stood beside her, she offered it to me.

I drank to the last drop, neither knowing nor caring whether it were wine or poison, since my heart seemed desperate at its failure and my spirit crushed beneath the weight of its great betrayal. I suppose it was the former, for the contents of that cup ran through my veins like fire and gave me back my courage and the joy of life.

I stepped to the dais and sat me down upon the couch, leaning against its rounded end so that I was almost face to face with Ayesha who had turned towards me, and thence could study her unveiled loveliness. For a while she said nothing, only eyed me up and down and smiled and smiled, as though she were waiting for that wine to do its work with me.

'Now that thou art a man again. Allan, tell me what thou didst see when thou wast more—or less—than man.'

So I told her all, for some power within her seemed to draw the truth out of me. Nor did it appear to surprise her much.

There is truth in thy dream, she said when I had finished: a lesson also.

'Then it was all a dream?' I interrupted.

Is not everything a dream, even life itself, Allan? If so, what can this be that thou hast seen, but a dream within a dream, and itself containing other dreams, as in the old days the ball fashioned by the eastern workers of ivory would oft be found to contain another ball, and this yet another and another and another, till at the inmost might be found a bead of gold, or perchance a jewel, which was the prize of him who could draw out ball from ball and leave them all unbroken.

That search was difficult and rarely was the jewel come by, if at all, so that some said there was none, save in the maker's mind. Yes, I have seen a man go crazed with seeking and die with the mystery unsolved. How much harder, then, is it to come at the diamond of Truth which lies at the core of all our nest of dreams and without which to rest upon they could not be fashioned to seem realities?'

But was it really a dream, and if so, what were the truth and the lesson?' I asked, determined not to allow her to bemuse or escape me with her metaphysical talk and illustrations,

'The first question has been answered, Allan, as well as I can answer, who am not the architect of this great globe of dreams, and as yet cannot clearly see the ineffable gem within, whose prisoned rays illuminate their substance, though so that only those with the insight of a god can catch their ur in the night of thought, since to most they are dark

w-flies in the glare of noon.' in what are the truth and the lesson?' I persisted, per-; that it was hopeless to extract from her an opinion as real nature of my experiences and that I must content

ou tellest me, Allan, that in thy dream or vision thou eem to appear before thyself seated on a throne and in If to find thy judge. That is the Truth whereof I spoke, how it found its way through the black and ignorant f one whose wit is so small, is more than I can guess, believed that it was revealed to me alone.'

v I, Allan, thought to myself that I began to see the of all these fantasies and that for once Ayesha had made If she had a theory and I developed that same theory hypnotic condition, it was not difficult to guess its However, I kept my mouth shut, and luckily for once I not seem to read my mind, perhaps because she was ich occupied in spinning her smooth web of entangling men worship their own god,' she went on, 'and yet ot to know that this god dwells within them and that they are a part. There he dwells and there they mould their own fashion, as the potter moulds his clay, though er the shape he seems to take beneath their fingers, remains the god infinite and unalterable. Still he is sker and the Sought, the Prayer and its Fulfilment, the ind the Hate, the Virtue and the Vice, since all these es the alchemy of his spirit turns to an ultimate and eternal Good. For the god is in all things and all things are in the god, whom men clothe with such diverse garments and whose countenance they hide beneath so many masks.

'In the tree flows the sap, yet what knows the great tree it nurtures of the sap? In the world's womb burns the fire that gives life, yet what of the fire knows the glorious earth it conceived and will destroy; in the heavens the great globes swing through space and rest not, yet what know they of the Strength that sent them spinning and in a time to come will stay their mighty motions, or turn them to another course? Therefore of everything this all-present god is judge; or rather not one but many judges, since of each living creature he makes its own magistrate to deal out justice according to that creature's law which in the beginning the god established for it and decreed. Thus in the breast of everyone there is a rule and by that rule, at work through a countless chain of lives, in the end he shall be lifted up to Heaven, or bound about and cast down to Hell and death.'

You mean a conscience, I suggested rather feebly, for her thoughts and images overpowered me.

'Aye, a conscience if thou wilt, and canst only understand that term, though it fits my theme but ill. This is my meaning, that consciences, as thou namest them, are many. I have one; thou, Allan, hast another; that black Axe-bearer has a third; the little yellow man a fourth, and so on through the tale of living things. For even a dog such as that thou sawest has a conscience and—like thyself or I—must in the end be its own judge, because of the spark that comes to it from above, the same spark which in me burns as a great fire, and in thee as a smouldering ember of green wood.'

'When you sit in judgment on yourself in a day to come, Ayesha,' I could not help interpolating. 'I trust that you will remember that humility did not shine among your virtues.'

She smiled in her vivid way—only twice or thrice did I see her smile thus and then it was like a flash of summer lightning illumining a clouded sky, since for the most part her face was grave and even sombre.

'Well answered,' she said. 'Goad the patient ox enough and even it will grow fierce and paw the ground.

"Humility! What have I to do with it, O Allan? Let humility be the part of the humble-souled and lowly, but for those who reign as I do, and they are few indeed, let there be pride and the glory they have carned. Now I have told thee of the Truth thou sawest in thy vision and wouldst thou hear the Lesson?'

'Yes,' I answered, 'since I may as well be done with it at once, and doubtless it will be good for me.'

'The Lesson, Allan, is one which thou preachest-humility. Vain man and foolish as thou art, thou didst desire to travel the Under-world in search of certain ones who once were all in all to thee-nay, not all in all since of them there were two or more-but at least much. Thus thou wouldst do because, as thou saidest, thou didst seek to know whether they still lived on beyond the gates of Blackness. Yes, thou saidest this, but what thou didst hope to learn in truth was whether they lived on in thee and for thee only. For thou, in thy vanity, didst picture these departed souls as doing naught in that Heaven they had won, save think of thee still burrowing on the earth, and, at times lightening thy labours with kisses from other lips than theirs.'

Then I pray pardon, Allan, who only judged of thee by others that were as men are made, and being such, not to be blamed if perchance from time to time, they turned to look on women, who alas! were as they are made. So at least it was when I knew the world, but mayhap since then its richest wine has turned to water, whereby I hope it has been bettered. At the least this was thy thought, that those women who had been thine for an hour, through all eternity could dream of naught else save thy perfections, and hope for naught else than to see thee at their sides through that eternity, or such part of thee as thou couldst spare to each of them. For thou didst forget that where they have gone there may be others even more peerless than thou art and more fit to hold a woman's love, which as we know on earth was ever changeful, and perhaps may so remain where it is certain that new lights must shine and new desires beckon. Dost understand me, Allan?'

'I think so,' I answered with a groan. 'I understand you to mean that worldly impressions soon wear out and that people who have departed to other spheres may there form new ties and forget the old.'

'Yes, Allan, as do those who remain upon this earth, whence these others have departed. Do men and women still re-marry in the world, Allan, as in my day they were wont to do?'

'Of course-it is allowed.'

'As many other things, or perchance this same thing, may be allowed elsewhere, for when there are so many habitations from which to choose, why should we always dwell in one of them, however strait the house or poor the prospect?'

Now understanding that I was symbolised by the 'strait house' and the 'poor prospect' I should have grown angry had not a certain sense of humour come to my rescue, who remembered that after all Ayesha's satire was profoundly true. Why, beyond the earth, should anyone desire to remain unalterably tied to and inextricably wrapped up in such a personality as my own, especially if others of superior texture abounded about them? Now that I came to think of it, the thing was absurd and not to be the least expected in the midst of a thousand new and vivid interests. I had met with one more disillusionment, that was all.

'Dost understand, Allan,' went on Ayesha, who evidently was determined that I should drink this cup to the last drop, 'that these dwellers in the sun, or the far planet where thou hast been according to thy tale, saw thee not and knew naught of thee? It may chance therefore that at this time thou wast not in their minds which at others dream thee continually. Or it may chance that they never dream of thee at all, having quite forgotten thee, as the weaned cub forgets its mother.'

'At least there was one who seemed to remember,' I exclaimed, for her poisoned mocking stung the words out of

'Aye, the savage, who being Nature's child, a sinner that departed hence by her own act' (how Ayesha knew this I cannot say. I never told her), 'has not yet put on perfection and therefore still remembers him whose kiss was last upon her lips. But surely, Allan, it is not thy desire to pass from the gentle, ordered claspings of those white souls to the tumultuous arms of such a one as this Still, let that be, for who knows what men will or will not do in jealousy and disappointed love? And the dog, it remembered also and even sought thee out, since dogs are more faithful and single-hearted than is mankind. There at least thou hast thy lesson, namely to grow more humble and never to think again that thou holdest all a woman's soul for aye, because once she was kind to thee for a little while on earth.

'Yes,' I answered, jumping up in a rage, 'as you say, I have my lesson, and more of it than I want. So by your leave, I will now bid you farewell, hoping that when it comes to be your turn to learn this lesson, or a worse, Ayesha, as I am sure it will one day, for something tells me so, you may enjoy it more than I have done.'

AYESHA'S FAREWELL

Thus I spoke whose nerves were on edge after all that I had seen or, as even then I suspected, seemed to see. For how could I believe that these visions of mine had any higher origin than Ayesha's rather malicious imagination? Already I had formed my theory.

It was that she must be a hypnotist of power, who, after she had put a spell upon her subject, could project into his mind such fancies as she chose together with a selection of her own theories. Only two points remained obscure. The first was—how did she get the necessary information about the private affairs of a humble individual like myself, for these were not known even to Zikali with whom she seemed to be in some kind of correspondence, or to Hans, at any rate in such completeness?

I could but presume that in some mysterious way she drew them from, or rather excited them in my own mind and memory, so that I seemed to see those with whom once I had been intimate, with modifications and in surroundings that her intelligence had carefully prepared. It would not be difficult for a mind like hers familiar, as I gathered it was, with the ancient lore of the Greeks and Egyptians, to create a kind of Hades and, by way of difference, to change it from one of shadow to one of intense illumination, and into it to plunge the consciousness of him upon whom she had laid her charm of sleep. I had seen nothing and heard nothing that she might not thus have moulded, always given that she had access to the needful clay of facts which I alone could furnish.

Granting this hypothesis, the second point was—what might be the object of her elaborate and most bitter jest? Well, I thought that I could guess. First, she wished to show her power, or rather to make me believe that she had power of a very unusual sort. Secondly, she owed Umslopogaas and myself a debt for our services in the war with Rezu which we had been told would be repaid in this way. Thirdly, I had offended her in some fashion and she took her opportunity settling the score. Also there was a fourth possibility—th really she considered herself a moral instructress and desire as she said, to teach me a lesson by showing how futile we human hopes and vanities in respect of the departed and the affections

Now I do not pretend that all this analysis of Ayesha motives occurred to me at the moment of my interview wi her; indeed, I only completed it later after much caref thought, when I found it sound and good. At that time, a though I had inklings, I was too bewildered to form a juilingment.

Further, I was too angry and it was from this bow of manger that I loosed a shaft at a venture as to some lessowhich awaited her. Perhaps certain words spoken by the dying Rezu had shaped that shaft. Or perhaps some shado of her advancing fate fell upon me.

The success of the shot, however, was remarkable. Eventhy it pierced the joints of her harness, and indeed we home to Ayesha's heart. She turned pale; all the peach-bloomhues faded from her lovely face, her great eyes seemed lessen and grow dull and her cheeks to fall in. Indeed, for a moment she looked old, very old, quite an aged woman Moreover, she wept, for I saw two big tears drop upon his white raiment and I was horrified.

'What has happened to you?' I said, or rather gasped.

'Naught,' she answered, 'save that thou hast hurt me sor Dost thou not know, Allan, that it is cruel to prophesy to any, since such words feathered from Fate's own wing arbarbed with venom, fester in the breast and mayhap brir about their own accomplishment. Most cruel of all is it who with them are repaid friendship and gentleness.'

I reflected to myself—yes, friendship of the order that called candid, and gentleness such as is hid in a cat's velve paw, but contented myself with asking how it was that st who said she was so powerful, came to fear anything at all.

"Recause as I have told the Aller of the categories as I have told the Aller of the categories as I have told the categories."

Because as I have told thee. Allan, there is no armouthat can turn the spear of Destiny which, when I heard those words of thine, it seemed to me, I know not why, was directed by thy hand. Look now on Rezu who thought himself un conquerable and yet was slain by the black Axe-bearer and whose bones to-night stay the famine of the jackals. Moreover I am accursed who sought to steal its servant from Heave to be my love, and how know I when and where vengeand will fall at last? Indeed, it has fallen already on me, who through the long ages amid savages must mourn widowed and alone, but not all of it—oh! I think, not all.

Then she began to weep in good earnest, and watching her, for the first time I understood that this glorious creature who seemed to be so powerful, was after all one of the most miserable of women and as much a prey to loneliness, every sort of passion and apprehensive fear, as can be any common mortal. If, as she said, she had found the secret of life, which of course I did not believe, at least it was obvious that she had lost that of happiness.

She sobbed softly and wept and while she did so the loveliness, which had left her for a little while, returned to her like light to a grey and darkened sky. Oh, how beautiful she seemed with the abundant locks in disorder over her tearstained face, how beautiful beyond imagining! My heart nelted as I studied her; I could think of nothing else except her urpassing charm and glory.

'I pray you, do not weep,' I said; 'it hurts me and indeed am sorry if I said anything to give you pain.'

But she only shook that glorious hair further about her ace and behind its veil wept on.

'You know, Ayesha,' I continued, 'you have said many ard things to me, making me the target of your bitter wit, herefore it is not strange that at last I answered you.'

'And has thou not deserved them, Allan?' she murmured a soft and broken tones from behind that veil of scented ocks.

'Why?' I asked.

Because from the beginning thou didst defy me showing n thine every accent that thou heldest me a liar and end of to account in body or in spirit, one not worthy of thy kind ook, or of those gentle words which once were my portion mong men. Oh! thou hast dealt hardly with me and therefore perchance—I know not—I paid thee back with such poor veapons as a woman holds, though all the while I had then well."

Then again she fell to sobbing, swaying herself gently so and to in her sweet sorrow.

It was too much. Not knowing what else to do to comfort her, I patted her ivory hand which lay upon the couch be me, and as this appeared to have no effect, I kissed it n she did not seem to resent. Then suddenly I remembered She tossed back her hair from her face and fixing her big eyes on me, said gently enough, looking down at her hand.

'What ails thee, Allan?'

'Oh, nothing,' I answered; 'only I remembered the story you told me about some man called Kallikrates.'

She frowned.

'And what of Kallikrates, Allan? Is it not enough that for my sins, with tears, empty longings and repentance, I must wait for him through all the weary centuries? Must I also wear the chains of this Kallikrates, to whom I owe many a debt, when he is far away? Say, didst thou see him in that Heaven of thine, Allan, for there perchance he dwells?'

I shook my head and tried to think the thing out while allthe time those wonderful eyes of hers seemed to draw the soul from me. It seemed to me that she bent forward and held up her face to me. Then I lost my reason and also bent forward. Yes, she made me mad, and, save her, I forgot all.

Swiftly she placed her hand upon my heart, saying,

'Stay! What meanest thou? Dost love me, Allan?'

I think so—that is—yes, I answered.

She sank back upon the couch away from me and began to laugh very softly.

What words are these, she said, 'that they pass thy lips so easily and so unmeant, perchance from long practice? Oh! Allan, I am astonished. Art thou the same man who some few days ago told me, and this unasked, that as soon wouldst thou think of courting the moon as of courting me? Art thou he who not a minute gone swore proudly that never had his heart and his lips wandered from certain angels whither they should not? And now, and now—?'

I coloured to my eyes and rose, muttering,

'Let me be gone!'

'Nay. Allan, why? I see no mark here,' and she held upher hand, scanning it carefully. Thou too art much what thou wert before, except perhaps in thy soul, which is invisible,' she added with a touch of malice. 'Nor am I angry with thee; indeed, hadst thou not tried to charm away my woe, I should have thought but poorly of thee as a man. There let it rest and be forgotten—or remembered as thou wilt. Still, in answer to thy words concerning my Kallikrates, what of those adored ones that, according to thy tale, but now thou didst find again in a place of light? Because they seemed faithless, shouldst thou be faithless also? Shame on thee, thou fickle Allan!

She paused, waiting for me to speak. Well, I could not. I had nothing to say who was utterly

me to be seated, saying,

; and within an hour.'

Thou thinkest, Allan,' she went on, 'that I have east my net about thee, and this is true: Learn wisdom from it, Allan, and never again defy a woman—that is, if she be fair, for then she is stronger than thou art, since Nature for its own purposes made her so. Whatever I have done by tears, that ancient artifice of my sex, as in other ways, is for thy instruction, Allan, that thou mayest benefit thereby.'

Again I sprang up, uttering an English exclamation which I trust Ayesha did not understand, and again she motioned to

'Nay, leave me not yet since, even if the light fancy of a in that comes and goes like the evening wind and for a eath made me dear to thee, has passed away, there remains tain work which we must do together. Although, thinking thyself alone, thou hast forgotten it, having been paid thine in fee, one is yet due to that old wizard in a far land who it thee to visit Kôr and me, as indeed he has reminded

This amazing statement aroused me from my personal and inful pre-occupation and caused me to stare at her blankly. 'Again thou disbelievest me,' she said, with a little stamp.

o so once more, Allan, and I swear I'll bring thee to grovel the ground and kiss my foot and babble nonsense to a man sworn to another man, such as never for all thy days on shalt think of without a blush of shame.'

'Oh! no,' I broke in hurriedly, 'I assure you that you are istaken. I believe every word you have said, or say or will

v: I do in truth.' 'Now thou liest. Well, what is one more falsehood among many? So let it pass.' 'What, indeed?' I echoed in eager affirmation, 'and as for ikali's message---' and I paused.

'It was to recall to my mind that he desired to learn whether certain great enterprise of his will succeed, the details of hich he says thou canst tell me. Repeat them to me.' So, glad enough to get away from more dangerous topics, I arrated to her as briefly and clearly as I could, the history of the old witch-doctor's feud with the royal House of Zulu-

and. She listened, taking in every word, and said, 'So now he yearns to know whether he will conquer or be thee on this journey, not for thy sake, Allan, but for his own I cannot tell thee, for what have I to do with the finish o this petty business, which to him seems so large? Still, as owe him a debt for luring the Axe-Bearer here to rid me omine enemy, and thee to lighten my solitude for an hour by the burnishing of thy mind, I will try. Set that bowl before me. Allan,' and she pointed to a marble tripod on which stood a basin half full of water, 'and come, sit close by me and look into it, telling me what thou seest.'

I obeyed her instructions and presently found myself with my head over the basin, staring into the water in the exact attitude of a person who is about to be shampooed.

This seems rather foolish. I said abjectly, for at that moment I resembled the Queen of Sheba in one particular, if in no other, namely, that there was no more spirit in me.

'What am I supposed to do? I see nothing at all.'

Look again, she said, and as she spoke the water grew clouded. Then on it appeared a picture. I saw the interior of a Kaffir hut dimly lighted by a single candle set in the neck of a bottle. To the left of the door of the hut was a bedstead and on it lay stretched a wasted and dying man, in whom to my astonishment, I recognised Cetywayo, King of the Zulus. At the foot of the bed stood another man—myself grown older by many years, and leaning over the bed, apparently whispering into the dying man's ear, was a grotesque and malevolent figure which I knew to be that of Zikali, Opener-of Roads, whose glowing eyes were fixed upon the terrified and tortured face of Cetywayo. All was as it happened afterwards, as I have written down in the book called 'Finished.'

I described what I saw to Ayesha and while I was doing so the picture vanished away, so that nothing remained save the clear water in the marble bowl. The story did not seem to interest her: indeed, she leaned back and yawned a little.

'Thy vision is good. Allan,' she said indifferently, 'and wide also, since thou canst see what passes in the sun or distant stars, and pictures of things to be in the water, to say nothing of other pictures in a woman's eyes, all within an hour. Well, this savage business concerns me not and of it I want to know no more. Yet it would appear that here the old wizard who is thy friend, has the answer that he desires. For there in the picture the king he hates lies dying while he hisses curses in his ear and thou dost watch the end. What more can he seek? Tell him it when ye meet, and tell him also it is my will that in future he should trouble me less, since instructed talk and savage vapourings. Indeed, he presumes too much. And now enough of him and his dark plots. Ye have your desires, all of you, and are paid in full.'

'Over-paid, perhaps,' I said with a sigh.
'Ah. Allan, I think that Lesson thou hast learned pleases

I love not to be wakened from my sleep to listen to his half-thee but little. Well, be comforted for the thing is common Hast never heard that there is but one morsel more bitter to the taste than desire denied, namely, desire fulfilled? Believe me that there can be no happiness for man until he attains a land where all desire is dead.'

'That is what the Buddha preached, Ayesha.'
'Aye, I remember the doctrines of that wise man well o without doubt had found a key to the gate of Truth, one only, for, mark thou, Allan, there are many. Yet, mar ng man must know desires, since without them, robbed on the control of the control bitions, strivings, hopes, fears, aye and of life itself, the e must die, which is not the will of the Lord of Life who eds a nursery for his servant's souls, wherein his swords of od and III shall shape them to his pattern. So it comes out, Allan, that what we think the worst is oft the best for and with that knowledge, if we are wise, let us assuage out terness and wipe away our tears.'

I have often thought that,' I said.

I doubt it not, Allan, since though it has pleased me to the a jest of thee, I know that thou hast thy share of wisdom ch little share as thou canst gather in thy few short years know, too, that thy heart is good and aspires high, and iend—well, I find in thee a friend indeed, as I think not for this time, nor certainly for the last. Mark, Allan, what I , not a lover, but a friend, which is higher far. For when ssion dies with the passing of the flesh, if there be no endship what will remain save certain memories that, may-

ewhere who were never more than lovers? With weariness, hold, as they stared into each other's empty soul, or even th disgust.

Therefore the wise will seek to turn those with whom Fate ales them into friends, since otherwise soon they will be ates them into friends, since otherwise soon they will be st for aye. More, if they are wiser still, having made them iends, they will suffer them to find lovers where they will. ood maxims, are they not? Yet hard to follow, or so, pernance, thou thinkest them—as I do?

She grew silent and brooded a while, resting her chin upon her hand and staring down the hal! Thus the aspect of he face was different from any that I had seen it wear. No longe had it the allure of Aphrodite or the mainsty of Hera; rathe might it have been that of Athene heise!! So wise it seemed so calm, so full of experience and of thresight, that almost it frightened me.

What was this woman's true too I wondered, what her real self, and what the sum of her art acred knowledge? Perhaps it was accident, or perhaps aroun, she guessed my mind. At any rate her next words see red as some sense an answer to these speculations. I there hereeve she contemplated me

My friend, we part to next no more in thy life's day. Often thou will wonder concerns 2 has as to what in truth I am, and mayhap in the end the adject will be to write me down some false and beinged as a reacter who, rejected of the world or driven from it has been as made choice to rule among savages, point the perfect of Oracle to that little audience and telling strong takes to such few travellers as come her way Perrip indeed I do play this part among many others, and I so thou are not rulge me wrongly.

*Allan, in the old days incomes who had sailed the northern seas, told had that the term and the rest and storm float mountains of accessibled from dizze cittle which are hid in darkness, where no sun shares. They find me also that whereas above the occan's breast appears hat a place and dazzling point, sunk beneath it is off a whose trozen is a myssible to man.

Such and I. Alian Of my being thou seest but one little peak plattering in bold or crowood with storm, as heaven's a moods sweep over it. But in the depths beneath are hid its white and broad for additions boldowed by the seas of time to caverns and to painces which are spirit doth inhabit. So picture me therefore as wise and hair, but with a soul uniform, and pray that in a large to come thou mayest see it in its splendom.

Hadst thou been other than thou art. I might have shown thee secrets, making clear to thee the parable of much that I have told thee in metaphor and varying fable, aye, and given thee great gifts of power and enduring days of which thou knowest nothing But of those who visit shrines. O Allan, two things are required, worship and faith, since without these the oracles are dumb and the healing waters will not flow.

'Now I, Ayesha, am a shrine: yet to me thou broughtest no worship until I won it by a woman's trick, and in me thou hast no faith. Therefore for thee the oracle will not speak and the waters of deliverance will not flow. Yet I blame thee not, who art as thou wast made and the hard world has whose majesty alone I still exercise on earth, I, whom men name Ayesha, am in all things. I tell thee that I am not One but Many and, being many, am both Here and Everywhere. When thou standest beneath the sky at night and lookest on the stars, remember that in them mine eyes behold thee; when the soft winds of evening blow, that my breath is on thy brow and when the thunder rolls, that there am I riding on the lightnings and rushing with the gale.'

'Do you mean that you are the goddess Isis?' I asked, bewildered. 'Because if so why did you tell me that you were

'Have it as thou wilt, Allan. All sounds do not reach thine ears; all sights are not open to thine eyes and therefore thou art both half deaf and blind. Perchance now that her shrines are dust and her worship is forgot, some spark of the spirit of that immortal Lady whose chariot was the moon, lingers on the earth in this woman's shape of mine, though her essence dwells afar, and perchance her other name is Nature, my mother and thine, O Allan. At the least hath not the World a soul—and of that soul am I not mayhap a part, aye, and thou also? For the rest are not the priest and the Divine

It was on my lips to answer, Yes, if the priest is a knave or a self-deceiver, but I did not.

'Farewell, Allan, and let Ayesha's benison go with thee. Safe shalt thou reach thy home, for all is prepared to take thee hence, and thy companions with thee. Safe shalt thou live for many a year, till thy time comes, and then, perchance, thou wilt find those whom thou hast lost more kind than they seemed to be to-night.'

She paused awhile, then added,

Hearken unto my last word! As I have said, much if I have told thee may bear a double meaning, as is the vol parables, to be interpreted as thou wilt. Yet one thing true. I love a certain man, in the old days named F nim here. Oh, shouldest thou find him in the world without, tel him that Ayesha awaits him and grows weary in the waiting Nay, thou wilt never find him, since even if he be born again by what token would he be known to thee? Therefore charge thee, keep my secrets well, lest Ayesha's curse should fall on thee. While thou livest tell naught of me to the world thou knowest. Dost thou swear to keep my secrets, Allan?

'I swear, Ayesha.'

'I thank thee, Allan,' she answered, and grew silent for a while,

At length Ayesha rose and drawing herself up to the full of her height, stood there majestic. Next she beckoned to me to come near, for I too had risen and left the dais.

I obeyed, and bending down she held her hands over me as though in blessing, then pointed towards the curtains which at this moment were drawn asunder, by whom I do not know. I went and when I reached them, turned to look my last on her.

There she stood as I had left her, but now her eyes, were fixed upon the ground and her face once more was brooding absently as though no such a man as I had ever been. It came into my mind that already she had forgotten me, the plaything of an hour, who had served her turn and been cast aside.

WHAT UMSLOPOGAAS SAW

LIKE one who dreams I passed down the outer hall where stood the silent guards as statues might, and out through the archway. Here I paused for a moment, partly to calm my mind in the familiar surroundings of the night, and partly because I thought that I heard someone approaching me through the gloom, and in such a place where I might have many enemies it was well to be prepared.

As it chanced, however, my imagined assailant was only Hans, who emerged from some place where he had been

'Oh, Baas,' he said in a low and shaky whisper, 'I am glad to see you again, and standing on your feet, not bein carried with them sticking straight in front of you as expected.'

'Why?' I asked.

'Oh, Baas, because of the things that happened in that place where the tall vrouw with her head tied up as though she had toothache, sits like a spider in a web.'

'Well, what happened, Hans?' I asked as we walked forward

This, Baas. The Doctoress talked and talked at you an Umslopogaas, and as she talked, your faces began to loo as though you had drunk half a flask too much of the begin, such as I wish I had some of here to-night, at once wis and foolish, and full and empty, Baas. Then you both rolle over and lay there quite dead, and whilst I was wonderin what I should do and how I should get out your bodies to bury them, the Doctoress came down off her platform an bent, first over you and next over Umslopogaas, whisperin into the ears of both of you. Then she took off a snake that looked as though it were made of gold with green eyes, which she wears about her middle beneath the long dish-cloth, Baas and held it to your lips and next to those of Umslopogaas.

'Well, and what then, Hans?'

'After that all sorts of things came-about, Baas, and felt as though the whole house were travelling through th air, Baas, twice as fast as a bullet does from a rifle. Suddenly, too, the room became filled with fire so hot that it scorched me, and so bright that it made my eyes water, although they can look at the sun without winking. And, Baas, the fire was full of spooks which walked around; yes, I saw some of them standing on your head and stomach, Baas, also on that of Umslopogaas, whilst others went and talked to the white Doctoress as quietly as though they had met her in the market-place and wanted to sell her eggs or butter. Then, Baas, suddenly I saw your reverend father, the Predikant, who looked as though he were red-hot, as doubtless he is in the Place of Fires. I thought he came up to me, Baas, and said, "Get out of this, Hans This is no place for a good Hottentot-like you, Hans, for here only the very best Christians can bear the heat for long."

That finished me, Baas I just answered that I handed you, the Baas Allan his son, over to his care, hoping that he would see that you did not burn in that oven, whatever happened to Umslopogaas. Then I shut my eyes and mouth and held my nose, and wriggled beneath those curtains as a snake does, Baas, and ran down the hall and across the kraal-yard and through the archway out into the night, where I have been sitting cooling myself ever since, waiting for you to be carried away. Baas. And now you have come alive and with not even your hair burnt off, which shows how wonderfulmust be the Great Medicine of Zikali, Baas, since nothing else could have saved you in that fire, no, not even your reverenced father, the Predikant

'Hans,' I said when he had finished, 'you are a very won-derful fellow, for you can get drunk on nothing at all. Please remember. Hans, that you have been drunk to-night; yes, very drunk indeed, and never date to repeat anything that, you thought you saw while you were drunk.'

'Yes, Baas, I understand that I was drunk and already. I have forgotten everything But, Baas, there is still a bottle full of brandy and it I could have just one tot I should forget so much better!

By now we had reached our camp and here I found Umslopogaas sitting in the doorway and staring at the sky.

Good-evening to you. Umslopogaas, I said in my most unconcerned manner, and waited

'Good-evening, Watcher-by-Night, who I thought was lost in the night, since in the end the night is stronger than any of its watchers.' At this cryptic remark I looked bewildered but said nothing. At length Umslopogaas, whose nature, for a Zulu, was impulsive and lacking in the ordinary native patience, asked, Did you make a journey this evening, Macumazahn, and so, what did you see?'

o, what did you see?
Did you have a dream this evening, Umslopogaas? I quired by way of answer, 'and if so, what was it about? thought that I saw you shut your eyes in the House of the hite One yonder, doubtless because you were weary of the which you did not understand.'

care the birds out of a meane garden. I while that the stone I went, aye, further than a shooting star, till I reached wonderful place. It does not much matter what it was like either, and indeed I am already beginning to forget, but there I met everyone I have ever known. I met the Lion of the Zulus, the Black One, the Earth-Shaker, he who had a "sister named Baleka, which sister," here he dropped his voice and looked about him suspiciously, 'bore a child, which child wa fostered by one Mopo, that Mopo who afterwards slew the Black One with the Princes. Now, Macumazahn, I had stone to settle with this Black One, aye, even though ou

Black One with the Princes. Now, Macunizann, I had score to settle with this Black One, aye, even though ou blood be much of the same colour, I had a score to settle with him, because of the slaying of this sister of his, Baleka together with the Langeni tribe. So I walked up to him an took him by the head-ring and spat in his face and bade his find a spear and shield, and meet me as man to man. Yes, did this. 'And what happened then, Umslopogaas?' I said, when it paused in his narrative.

'Macumazahn, nothing happened at all. My hand seemed to go through his head-ring and the skull beneath, and shut upon itself while he went on talking to someone else a captain whom I recognised, yes, one Faku, whom in the days of Dingaan, the Black One's brother, I myself sleep upon the Ghost-Mountain.

'Yes, Macumazahn, and Faku was telling him the tale a now I killed him and of the fight that I and my blood-broth and the wolves made, there on the knees of the old witch whits aloft on the Ghost-Mountain waiting for the world to differ I could understand their talk, though mine went by the like the wind.

'Macumazahn, they passed away and there came other Dingaan among them, aye. Dingaan who also knows som thing of the Witch-Mountain, seeing that there Mopo and hurled him to his death. With him also I would have ha words, but it was the same story, only presently he caugh sight of the Black One, ves. of Chaka whom he slew, stal bing him with the little red assegar, and turned and fled, because in that land I think he still fears Chaka, Macumazahi or so the dream told.

I went on and met others, men I had fought in my day most of them, among them was Jikiza, he who ruled the People of the Axe before me whom I slew with his own ax I lifted the axe and made me ready to fight again, but me one of them took any note of me. There they walked about or sat drinking beer or taking shuff, but never a sup of the beer or a pinch of the shuff did they offer to me, no, not eve those among them whom I chanced not to have killed. So I let them and walked on, seeking for Mopo, my foster-father, and a certain man, his blood brother, by whose side I hunte with the wolves wes for them, and for another.

'Well, and did you find them' I asked.

Mopo I tound not, which makes me think, Macumazahi that, as once you hinted to me he whom I thought long dear perchance still lingers on the earth. But the others I diffind a and he ceased, brooding

Now I knew enough of Umslopogaas's history to be awat that he had loved this man and woman of whom he spok more than any others on the cert. The 'blood-brother,' whos name he would not utter, by which he did not mean the he was his brother in blood but one with whom he had mad a pact of eternal friendship by the interchange of blood c some such ceremony, according to report, had dwelt wit him on the Witch-Mountain where legend told, though this could scarcely believe, that they hunted with a pack of hyena. There, it said also, they fought a great fight with a ban sent out by Dingaan the king under the command of the Faku whom Umslopogaas had mentioned, in which fight the 'Blood-Brother,' wielder of a famous club known as Watcher of-the-Fords, got his death after doing mighty deeds. There also, as I had heard, Nada the Lily, whose beauty was still famous in the land, died under circumstances strange as they were sad.

Naturally, remembering my own experiences, or rather what seemed to be my experiences, for already I had made up my mind that they were but a dream, I was most anxious to learn whether these two who had been so dear to this fierce Zulu, had recognised him.

'Well, and what did they say to you, Umslopogaas?' I asked.

'Macumazahn, they said nothing at all. Hearken! There stood this pair, or sometimes they moved to and fro; my brother, an even greater man than he used to be, with the wolfskin girt about him and the club, Watcher-of-the-Fords, which he alone could wield, upon his shoulder, and Nada, grown lovelier even than she was of old, so lovely, Macumazahn, that my heart rose into my throat when I saw her and stopped my breath. Yes, Macumazahn, there they stood, or walked about arm in arm as lovers might, and looked into each other's eyes and talked of how they had known each other on the earth, for I could understand their words or thoughts, and how it was good to be at rest together where they were.'

"You see, they were old friends, Umslopogaas,' I said.
"Yes, Macumazahn, very old friends as I thought. So much so that they had never a word to say of me who also was the old friend of both of them. Aye, my brother, whose name I am sworn not to speak, the woman-hater who vowed he loved nothing save me and the wolves, could smile into the face of Nada the Lily, Nada the bride of my youth, yet never a word of me, while she could smile back and tell him how great a warrior he had been and never a word of me whose deeds she was wont to praise, who saved her in the Halakazi caves and from Dingaan; no, never a word of me although I stood there staring at them.'

'I suppose that they did not see you, Umslopogaas.'

That is so, Macumazahn; I am sure that they did not see me, for if they had they would not have been so much at ease. But I saw them and as they would not take heed when I shouted, I ran up calling to my brother to defend himself with his club. Then, as he still took no note, I lifted the axe Inkosikaas, making it circle in the light, and smote with all

'Only this, Macumazahn, that the axe went straight through my brother from the crown of his head to the groin, cutting him in two, and he just went on talking! Indeed, he did more, for stooping down he gathered a white hly-bloom which grew there and gave it to Nada, who smelt at it, smiled and thanked him, and then thrust it into her girdle, still thanking him all the while. Yes, she did this for I saw it with my eyes, Macumazahn.'

Here the Zulu's voice broke and I think that he wept, for in the faint light I saw him draw his long hand across his eyes, whereon I took the opportunity to turn my back and light a pipe.

'Macumazahn,' he went on presently, 'it seems that madness took hold of me for a while, for I shouted and raved at them, thinking that words and rage might hurt where good steel could not, and as I did so they faded away and disappeared, still smiling and talking. Nada smelling at the lily which, having a long stalk, rose up above her breast. After this I rushed away and suddenly met that savage king, Rezu, whom I slew a few days gone. At him I went with the axe, wondering whether he would put up a better fight this second time.'

'And did he. Umslopogaas'

'Nay, but I think he felt me for he turned and fled and when I tried to follow I could not see him. So I ran on and presently who should I find but Baleka, Baleka, Chaka's "sister" who—repeat it not. Macumazahn—was my mother; and, Macumazahn, the saw me Yes, though I was but little when last she looked on me who now am great and grim, she saw and knew me, for she floated up to me and smiled at me an seemed to press her lips upon my torchead, though I could feel no kiss, and to draw the soreness out of my heari. Then she, too, was gone and of a sudden I fell down throug space, having I suppose, stepped into some deep hole, or per chance a well.

The next I knew was that I awoke in the house of the White Witch and saw you sleeping at my side and the Witch leaning back upon her bed and smiling at me through the thin blanket with which she covers herself up, for I could see the laughter in her eyes.

'Now I grew mad with her because of the things that had seen in the Place of Dreams, and it came into my hear that it would be well to kill her that the world might be riof her and her evil magic which can show lies to men. S

Then she said something in the tongue I cannot understand, and pointed with her finger, and lo! next moment it was as if giants had seized me and were whirling me away. till presently I found myself breathless but unharmed beyond the arch and—what does it all mean, Macumazahn?' 'Very little, as I think, Umslopogaas, except that this queen has powers to which those of Zikali are as nothing, and can cause visions to float before the eyes of men. For know that such things as you saw, I saw, and in them those whom I have loved also seemed to take no thought of me but only to be concerned with each other. Moreover when I awoke and told this to the queen who is called She-who-commands, she laughed at me as she did at you, and said that it was a good lesson for my pride who in that pride had believed that the dead only thought of the living. But I think that the being distraught, I sprang up and lifted the axe and stepped lesson came from her who wished to humble us, Umslopogaas, and that it was her mind that shaped these visions which we

'Nay, Umslopogaas, I believe that by her magic she drew our stories out of our own hearts and then set them forth to us afresh, putting her own colour on them. Also it may be that she drew something from Hans, and from Goroko and the other Zulus with you, and thus paid us the fee that she had promised for our service, but in lung-sick oxen and barren cows, not in good cattle, Umslopogaas.

He nodded and said. Though at the time I seemed to go mad and though I know that women are false and men must follow where they lead them, never will I believe that my brother, the womanhater, and Nada are lovers in the land below and have there forgotten me, the comrade of one of them and the husband of the other. Moreover I hold, Macumazahn, that you and I have met with a just reward for our folly. 'We have sought to look through the bottom of the grave at things which the Great-Great in Heaven above did not mean that men should see, and now that we have seen we are unhappier than we were, since such dreams burn themseupon the heart as a red-hot iron burns the hide of an ox

"To you. Watcher-by-Night, I say, "Content yourself with your watching and whatever it may bring to you in fame and wealth." And to myself I say, "Holder of the Axe, content yourself with the axe and what it may bring to you in fair fight and glory"; and to both of us I say, "Let the Dead sleep unawakened until we go to join them, which surely will be soon enough."

spoken ere ever we set out on this journey."

'Not so, Macumazahn, since that journey we were fated to make to save one who hes yonder, the Lady Sad-Eyes, and, as they tell me, is well again. Also Zikali willed it, and who can resist the will of the Opener-of-Roads? So it is made and we have seen many strange things and won some glory and come to know how deep is the pool of our own foolishness, who thought that we could search out the secrets of Death, and there have only found those of a witch's mind and venom, reflected as in water. And now having discovered all these things I wish to be gone from this haunted land. When do we march, Macumazahn?'

'To-morrow morning, I believe, if the Lady Sad-Eyes and the others are well enough, as She-who-commands says they will be 'Good. Then I would sleep who am more weary than I was after I had killed Rezu in the battle on the mountain.'

'Yes,' I answered, 'since it is harder to fight ghosts than men, and dreams, if they be bad, are more dreadful than deeds. Good-night, Umslopogaas.'

He went, and I too went to see how it fared with Inez I found that she was test asleep but in a quite different sleep to that into which Ayesha seemed to have plunged her. Nov it was absolutely natural and looking at her lying there upor the bed, I thought how young and healthy was her appearance. The women in charge of her also told me that she had awakened at the hour appointed by She-who-commands, as i seemed, quite well and very hungry, although she appeared to be puzzled by her surroundings. After she had eaten, they added that she had 'sung a song' which was probably a hymn, and prayed upon her knees, 'making signs upon he breast' and then gone quietly to bed.

My anxiety relieved as regards Inex, I returned to my own of turning in I sat in the doorway contemplating the beauty of the night while I watched the countless fireflies that scemed to dust the air with sparks of burning gold; also the great owls and other fowl that haunt the dark. These had come out in numbers from their hiding-places among the ruins and sailed to and fro like white-winged spirits, now seen and now lost in the gloom.

While I sat thus many reflections came to me as to the extraordinary nature of my experiences during the past few days. Had any man ever known the like, I wondered? What could they mean and what could this marvellous woman Ayesha be? Was she perhaps a personification of Nature itself as indeed to some extent all women are? Was she human at all, or was she some spirit symbolising a departed people, faith and civilisation, and haunting the ruins where once she reigned as queen? No, the idea was ridiculous, since such beings do not exist, though it was impossible to doubt that she possessed powers beyond those of common humanity, as she possessed beauty and fascination greater than are given to any other woman.

Why did she do this, I wondered. Perhaps to pretend to powers which she did not possess, perhaps out of sheer elfish mischief, or perhaps, as she asserted, just to teach us a lesson and to humble us in our own sight. Well, if so she had succeeded, for never did I feel so crushed and humiliated as at that moment.

I had seemed to descend, or ascend, into Hades, and there had only seen things that gave me little joy and did but serve to reopen old wounds. Then, on awaking, I had been bewitched; yes, fresh from those visions of the most dear dead, witched; yes, fresh from those visions of the most dear dead, I had been bewitched by the overpowering magic of this woman's loveliness and charm, and made a fool of myself, only to be brought back to my senses by her triumphant mockers. Oh I was harded indeed and not the add this is mockery. Oh, I was humbled indeed, and yet the odd thing is that I could not feel angry with her, and what is more that, perhaps from vanity, I believed in her professions of friendship

Well, the upshot of it was that, like Umslopogaas, more than anything else in the world did I desire to depart from this haunted Kôr and to bury all its recollections in such activities as fortune might bring to me. And yet, and vet it was well to have seen it and to have plucked the flower of such marvellous experience, nor, as I knew even then, could f ever inter the memory of Ayesha the wise, the perfect in all loveliness, and the half-divine in power.

When I awoke the next morning the sun was well up and after I had taken a swim in the old bath and dressed myself. I went to see how it fared with Inez I found her sitting at the door of her house looking extremely well and with a radiant face. She was engaged in making a chain of some small and beautiful blue flowers of the iris tribe, of which quantities grew about, that she threaded together upon stalks: of dry grass.

This chain, which was just finished, she threw over her head so that it hung down upon her white robe, for now she was dressed like an Arab woman though without the veil. I watched her unseen for a little while then came forward and spoke to her. She started at the sight of me and rose as though to run away, then, apparently reassured by my anpearance, selected a particularly fine flower and offered it to me

I saw at once that she did not know me in the least and thought that she had never seen me before, in short, that her mind had gone, exactly as Avesha had said that it would do. By way of making conversation I asked her if she felt well. She replied. Oh, yes, she had never felt better, then added.

'Daddy has gone on a long journey and will not be back of

An idea came to me and I answered.

'Yes, Inez, but I am a friend of his and he has sent meto take you to a place where I hope that we shall find him. Only it is far away, so you also must make a long journey."

'Oh, that will be nice, I do so love travelling, especially to find Daddy, who I expect will have my proper clothes with him, not these which, although they are very comfortable and pretty, seem different to what I used to wear. You look very nice too and I am sure that we shall be great friends, which I am glad of, for I have been rather lonely since my mother went to live with the saints in Heaven, because, you see, Daddy is so busy and so often away, that I do not see much of him.

Upon my word I could have wept when I heard her prattle

Upon my word I could have wept when I heard her prattle on thus. It is so terribly unnatural, almost dreadful indeed, to listen to a full-grown woman who talks in the accents and expresses the thoughts of a child. However, under all the circumstances I recognised that her calamity was merciful, and remembering that Ayesha had prophesied the recovery of her mind as well as its loss and how great seemed to be her powers in these directions, I took such comfort as I could.

Leaving her I went to see the two Zulus who had been wounded and found to my joy that they were now quite well and fit to travel, for here, too, Ayesha's prophecy had proved good. The other men also were completely rested and anxious to be gone like Umslopogaas and myself.

While I was eating my breakfast Hans announced the venerable Billali, who with a sweeping bow informed me that he had come to inquire when we should be ready to start, as he had received orders to see to all the necessary arrangements. I replied—within an hour, and he departed in a hurry.

But little after the appointed time he reappeared with a number of litters and their bearers, also with a bodyguard of twenty-five picked men, all of whom we recognised as brave fellows who had fought well in the battle. These men and the bearers old Billali harangued, telling them that they were to guide, carry and escort us to the other side of the great swamp, or further if we needed it, and that it was the word of She-who-commands that if so much as the smallest harm came to any of us, even by accident, they should die every man of them 'by the hot-pot,' whatever that might be, for I was not sure of the significance of this horror.¹ Then he asked them if they understood. They replied with fervour that they under-

As a matter of fact they did, and I think would have done so independently of Ayesha's command, since they looked upon Umslopogaas and myself almost as gods and thought that we could destroy them all if we wished, as we had destroyed Rezu and his host.

I asked Billali if he were not coming with us to which he stood perfectly and would lead and guard us as though we were their own mothers.

I asked Billali if he were not coming with us, to which he replied, No, as She-who-commands had returned to her own place and he must follow her at once. I asked him again where her own place might be, to which he answered vaguely that it was everywhere, and he stared first at the heavens and then at the earth as though she inhabited both of them, adding that generally it was 'in the Caves,' though what he meant by that I did not know. Then he said that he was very glad to have met us and that the sight of Umslopogaas killing Rezu was a spectacle that he would remember with pleasure all his life. Also he asked me for a present. I gave him a spare pencil that I possessed in a little German silver case, with which he was delighted. Thus I parted with old Billali, of whom I shall always think with a certain affection.

I noticed even then that he kept very clear indeed of Umslopogaas, thinking, I suppose, that he might take a last opportunity to fulfil his threats and introduce him to his terrible Axe.

UMSLOPOGAAS WEARS THE GREAT MEDICINE

A LITTLE while later we started, some of us in litters, including the wounded Zulus, who I insisted should be carried for a day or two, and some on foot. Inez I caused to be borne immediately in front of myself so that I could keep an eye upon her. Moreover I put her in the especial charge of Hans, to whom fortunately she took a great fancy at once, perhaps because she remembered subconsciously that she knew him and that he had been kind to her, although when they met after ther long sleep, as in my own case, she did not recognise him in the least.

Soon, however, they were again the fastest of friends, so much so that within a day or two the little Hottentot practically filled the place of a maid to her, attending to her every want and looking after her exactly as a nurse does after a child, with the result that it was quite touching to see how she came to depend upon him, 'her monkey,' as she called him, and how fond he grew of her.

Once, indeed, there was trouble, since hearing a noise, I came up to find Hans bristling with fury and threatening to shoot one of the Zulus, who stupidly, or perhaps rudely, had knocked against the litter of Inez and nearly turned it over. For the rest, the Lady Sad-Eyes, as they called her, had for the time become the Lady Glad-Eyes, since she was merry as the day was long, laughing and singing and playing just as a healthy happy child should do.

Only once did I see her wretched and weep. It was when a kitten which she had insisted in bringing with her, sprang out of the litter and vanished into some bush where it could not be found. Even then she was soon consoled and dried her tears, when Hans explained to her in a mixture of bad English and worse Portuguese, that it had only run away because it wished to get back to its mother which it loved, and that it was cruel to separate it from its mother.

We made good progress and by the evening were over the crest of the cliff or volcano 1

the great plain of Kôr, and descending rapidly to a sheltered spot on the outer slope where our camp was to be set for the night

Not very far from this place, as I think I have mentioned, stood, and I suppose still stands, a very curious pinnacle of rock, which, doubtless being of some harder sort, had remained when, hundreds of thousands or millions of years before, the surrounding lava had been washed or had correded away. This rock pillar was perhaps fifty feet high and as smooth as though it had been worked by man; indeed, I remembered having remarked to Hans, or Umslopogaas—I forget which—when we passed it on our inward journey, that there was a column which no monkey could climb.

As we went by it for the second time, the sun had already disappeared behind the western chil, but a fierce ray from its sinking orb, struck upon a storm-cloud that hung over us, and thence was reflected in a glow of angry light of which the fecus or centre seemed to fall upon the summit of this strange and obelisk-like pinnacle of took.

At the moment I was out of my litter and walking with. Umslopogaas at the end of the line, to make sure that no one straggled in the oncoming darkness. When we had passed the column by some forty or tifty yards, something caused Umslopigaas to turn and look back. He uttered an exclamation which made me follow his example, with the result that I saw a very wonderful thing. For there on the point of the pillar, like St. Simeon Stylites on his famous column, glowing in the senset rays as though she were on fire, stood Ayesha herself!

It was a strange and in a way a glorious sight, for poised thus between earth and heaven, she looked like some glowing angel rather than a woman, standing as she seemed to do upon the darkness since the shadows, save for the faintest outline, had swallowed up the column that supported her. Moreover, in the intense, rich light that was focussed on her, we could see every detail of her form and face, for she was unveiled, and even her large and tender eyes which gazed upwards emptily (at this moment they seemed very tender), yes, and the little gold studs that glittered on her sandals and the shine of the snake girdle she wore about her waist.

We stared and stared till I said inconsequently,

'Learn, Umslopogaas, what a har is that old Billali, who told me that She-who-commands had departed from Kôr, to her own place.'

'Perhaps this rock edge is her own place, if she be there at all, Macumazahn.' 'If she be there,' I answered angrily, for my nerves were at once thrilled and torn. 'Speak not empty words, Umslopogaas, for where else can she be when we see her with our eves?' Who am I that I should know the ways of witches who.

way in silence. This was the last that I saw of the glorious Avesha, if indeed I did see her and not her ghost. Yet it is true that for all the first part of the journey, till we were through the great swamp in fact, from time to time I was conscious, or imagined that I was conscious of her presence. Moreover, once others saw her, or someone who might have been her. It happened thus. We were in the centre of the great swamp and the trained guides who were leading came to a place where the path forked and were uncertain which road to take. Finally they fixed on the right-hand path and were preparing to follow it together with those who bore the litter of Inez, by the side of which Hans was walking as usual.

At this moment, as Hans told me, the guides went down upon their faces and he saw standing in front of them a whiteveiled form who pointed to the left-hand path, and then seemed to be lost in the mist. Without a word the guides rose and followed this left-hand path. Hans stopped the litter till I came up when he told me what had happened, while Inez also began to chatter in her childish fashion about a 'White' Lady.'

I had the curiosity to walk a little way along the righthand path which they were about to take. Only a few yards further on I found myself sinking in a floating quagmire from time, for as I discovered afterwards by probing with a pole, the water beneath the matted reeds was deep. That night I questioned the guides upon the subject, but without result, for they pretended to have seen nothing and not to understand what I meant. Of neither of these incidents have I any explanation to offer, except that once contracted, it is as difficult to be rid of the habit of hallucinations as of any other.

It is not necessary that I should give all the details of our long homeward journey. So I will only say that having dismissed our bearers and escort when we reached higher ground beyond the horrible swamp, keeping one litter for Inez in which the Zulus carried her when she was tired, we accomplished it in complete safety and having crossed the Zambesi, at last one evening reached the house called Strathmuir.

Here we found the waggon and oven quite safe and were welcomed rapturously by my Zulu driver and the voorlooper, who had made up their minds that we were dead and were thinking of trekking homewards. Here also Thomaso greeted us, though I think that, like the Zulus, he was astonished at our safe return and indeed not over-pleased to see us. I told him that Captain Robertson had been killed in a fight in which we had rescued his daughter from the cannibals who had carried her off (information which I cautioned him to keep to himself) but nothing else that I could help.

Also I warned the Zulus through Umslopogaas and Goroko, that no mention was to be made of our adventures either then or afterwards, since if this were done the curse of the White Queen would fall on them and bring them to disaster and death. I added that the name of this queen and everything that was connected with her, or her doings, must be locked up in their own hearts. It must be like the name of dead kings, not to be spoken. Not indeed did they ever speak it or tell the story of our search, because they were too much afraid both of Ayesha whom they believed to be the greatest of all witches, and of the axe of their captain, Umslopogaas.

Inez went to bed that night without seeming to recognise her old home, to all appearance just a mindless child as she had been ever since she awoke from her trance at Kôr. Next morning, however, Hans came to tell me that she was changed and that she wished to speak with me. I went, wondering, to find her in the sitting-room dressed in European clothes which she had taken from where she kept them, and once more a reasoning woman.

'Mr. Quatermain,' she said, 'I suppose that I must have been ill, for the last thing I remember is going to sleep on the night after you started for the hippopotamus hunt. Where is my father? Did any harm come to him while he was hunting?'

'Alas!' I answered, lying boldly, for I feared lest the truth should take away her mind again, 'it did. He was trampled upon by a hippopotamus bull, which charged him and killed, and we were obliged to bury him where he died.'

She bowed her head for a while and muttered some praver for his soul, then looked at me keenly and said,

'I do not think you are telling me everything, Mr. Quatermain, but something seems to say to me that this is because it is not well that I should learn everything.'

'No,' I answered, 'you have been ill and out of your mind for quite a long while; something gave you a shock. I think that you learned of your father's death, which you have now forgotten, and were overcome with the news. Please trust to me and believe that if I keep anything back from you, it is because I think it best to do so for the present.'

'I trust and I believe,' she answerd. 'Now please leave me, but tell me first where are those women and their children?' 'After your father died they went away,' I replied. lying adventures I do not know to this hour, though my opinion is that it was but little. To begin with, everyone, including Thomaso, was threatened with the direst consequences if he said a word to her on the subject; moreover in her way she was a wise woman, one who knew when it was best not to ask questions. She was aware that she had suffered from a fit of aberration or madness and that during this time her father had died and certain peculiar things had happened. There she was content to leave the business and she never again spoke to me upon the subject. Of this I was very glad, as how on earth could I have explained to her about Ayesha's prophecies as to her lapse into childishness and subsequent return to a normal state when she reached her home, seeing that

Once indeed she did inquire what had become of Janee, to which I approved the require what had become of Janee.

It was another lie, at any rate by implication, but I hold the there are occasions when it it righteous to lie. At least these particular falsehoods have never troubled my conscience.

Here I may as well finish the story of Inez, that is, as fa as I can. As I have shown she was always a woman of melancholy and religious temperament, qualities that seeme to grow upon her after her return to health. Certainly th religion did, for continually she was engaged in prayer, development with which heredity may have had somethin to do, since after he became a reformed character and grev unsettled in his mind, her father followed the same road.

On our return to civilisation, as it chanced, one of the first persons with whom she came in contact was a very earnest and excellent old priest of her own faith. The end of this intimacy was much what might have been expected Very soon Inez determined to renounce the world, which I think never had any great attractions for her, and entered a sisterhood of an extremely strict Order in Natal, where, added to her many micrits, her considerable possessions made her very welcome indeed.

Once in after years I saw her again when she expected before long to become the Mother-Superior of her convent. I found her very cheerful and she told me that her happiness was complete. Even then she did not ask me the true story of what had happened to her during that period when her mind was a blank. She said that she knew something had happened but that as she no longer tell any curiosity about earthly things, she did not wish to know the details. Again I rejoiced, for how could I tell the true tale and expect to be believed, even by the most confiding and simple-minder nun?

To return to more immediate events. When we had beer at Strathmuir for a day or two and I thought that her mind was clear enough to judge et affairs. I told Inez that I must journey on to Natal, and asked her what she wished to do. Without a moment's hestation she replied that she desired to come with me, as now that her tather was dead nothing would induce her to continue to live at Strathmuir without friends, or indeed the consolations of religion.

Then she showed me a secret hiding-place cunningly devised in a sort of cellar under the sitting-room floor, where her father was accustomed to keep the spirits of which he consumed so great a quantity. In this hole beneath some bricks, we discovered a large sum in gold stored away, which Robertson had always told his daughter she would find the in the event of anything happening to him. With the monwere his will and securities, also certain mementos of his you and some love-letters together with a prayer-book that h mother had given him. These valuables, of which no one knew the existence e cept herself, we removed and then made our preparations for departure. They were simple; such articles of value as v could carry were packed into the waggon and the best of the cattle we drove with us. The place with the store and the rest of the stock were handed over to Thomaso on a hal profit agreement that he should remit the share of Inez twice a year to a bank on the coast, where her father had a account. Whether or not he ever did this I am unable to say, but as no one wished to stop at Strathmuir, I could con ceive no better plan because purchasers of property in the district did not exist. As we trekked away one fine morning I asked Inez whether she was sorry to leave the place. 'No.' she replied with energy, 'my life there has been hell and I never wish to see it again.'

Now it was after this, on the northern borders of Zululand that Zikali's Great Medicine, as Hans called it, really playe its chief part, for without it I think that we should have bee killed, every one of us. I do not propose to set out th business in detail; it is too long and intricate. Suffice it t say, therefore, that it had to do with the plots of Umslopogaa against Cetywayo, which had been betrayed by his wif Monazi and her lover Lousta, both of whom I have mentione earlier in this record. The result was that a watch for him wa kept on all the frontiers, because it was guessed that sooner of later he would return to Zululand; also it had become know that he was travelling in my company.

So it came about that when my approach was reported b spies, a company was gathered under the command of man connected with the Royal House, and by it we wer surrounded. Before attacking, however, his captain sent me to me with the message that with me the King had no quarre although I was travelling in doubtful company, and that i I would deliver over to him Umslopogaas, Chief of the Peopl of the Axe, and his followers I might no white - 7 - 1 be attacked at once and killed every one of us, since it was not desired that any witness should be left of what happened to Umslopogaas. Having delivered this ultimatum and declined any argument as to its terms, the messengers retired saying that they would return for my answer within half ar hour.

When they were out of hearing Umslopogaas, who had listened to their words in grim silence, turned and spoke it such fashion as might have been expected of him.

'Macumazahn,' he said, 'now I come to the end of an unlucky journey, though mayhap it is not so evil as it seems since I who went out to seek the dead but to be filled by yonder White Witch with the meat of mocking shadows, an about to find the dead in the only way in which they can be found, namely by becoming of their number.'

'Not so, Macumazahn. That child of the King will give you safe-conduct. It is I and mine whose blood he seeks, as he has the right to do, since it is true that I would have raised rebellion against the King, I who wearied of my petty lot and knew that by blood his place was mine. In this quarrel you have no share, though you, whose heart is as white as your skin, are not minded to desert me. Moreover, even if you wished to fight, there is one in the waggon yonder whose life is not yours to give The Lady Sad-Eves is as a child in your arms and her you must bear to safety.

Now this argument was so unanswerable that I did not know what to say. So I only asked what he meant to do, as escape was impossible, seeing that we were surrounded on every side.

'Make a glorious end, Macumazahn,' he said with a smile, 'I will go out with those who cling to me, that is with all who remain of my men, since my fate must be theirs, and stand back to back on yonder mound and there wait till these dogs of the King come up against us Watch a while, Macumazahn, and see how Umhlopekazi, Bearer of the Axe, and the warriors of the Axe can fight and die.'

Now I was silent for I knew not what to say. There we all stood silent, while minute by minute I watched the shadow creeping forward towards a mark that the head messenger had made with his spear on the ground, for he had said that when it touched that mark he would return for his answer.

In this rather dreadful silence I heard a dry little cough, which I knew came from the throat of Hans, and to be his method of indicating that he had a remark to make.

. What is it?' I asked with irritation, for it was annoying o see him seated there on the ground fanning himself with he remains of a hat and staring vacantly at the sky.

'Nothing, Baas, or rather, only this, Baas: Those hyenas of Zulus are even more afraid of the Great Medicine than were the cannibals up north, since the maker of it is nearer to them, Baas. You remember, Baas, they knelt to it, as it were, . when we were going out of Zululand.' Well, what of it, now that we are going into Zululand?"

I inquired sharply. 'Do you want me to show it to them?' 'No, Baas. What is the use, seeing that they are ready to let you pass, also the Lady Sad-Eyes, and me and the cattle with the driver and voorlooper, which is better still, and all the other goods. So what have you to gain by showing them the medicine? But perchance if it were on the neck of Umslopogaas and he showed it to them and brought it to their minds that those who touch him who is in the shadow of Zikali's Great Medicine, or aught that is his, die within three moons in this way or in that-well, Baas, who knows?' and again he coughed drily and stared at the sky. I translated what Hans had said in Dutch to Umslopoguas, who remarked indifferently, 'This little yellow man is well named Light-in-Darkness; at least the plan can be tried-if it fails there is always time to die.'

So thinking that this was an occasion on which I might properly do so, for the first time I took off the talisman which I had worn for so long, and Umslopogaas put it over his head and hid it beneath his blanket.

A little while later the messengers returned and this time the captain himself came with them, as he said to great me. for I knew him slightly and once we had dealt together about some cattle. After a friendly chat he turned to the matter of Umslopogaas, explaining the case at some length. I said that I quite understood his position but that it was a very aukward thing to interfere with a man who was the actual wearer of the Great Medicine of Zikali itself. When the captain heard this his eyes almost started out of his head. 'The Great Medicine of the Opener of Roads!' he exclast poison is a snake's only spear. Shall I tell the boys to inspan the oxen, Baas? I think the further we get from that King's captain and his men, the more comfortably shall we travel, especially now when we no longer have the Great Medicine to protect us."

'You suggested giving it to him. Hans,' I said.

'Yes, Baas, I had rather that Umslopogaas went away with the Great Medicine, than that you kept the Great Medicine and he stopped with us here. Never travel with a traitor, Baas, at any rate in the land of the king whom he wishes to kill. Kings are very selfish people, Baas, and do not like being killed, especially by someone who wishes to sit upon their stool and to take the royal salute. No one gives the royal salute to a dead king. Baas, however great he was before he died, and no one thinks the worse of a king who was a traitor before he became a king.

ALLAN DELIVERS THE MESSAGE

ONCE more I sat in the Black Kloof face to face with old Zikali.

'So you have got back safely, Macumazahn,' he said. 'Well, I told you you would, did I not? As for what happened to you upon the journey, let it be, for now that I am old long stories tire me and I daresay that there is nothing wonderful about this one. Where is the charm I lent you? Give it back now that it has served its turn.'

'I have not got it, Zikali. I passed it on to Umslopogaas

'Oh! yes, so you did. I had forgotten. Here it is,' and opening his robe of fur, he showed me the hideous little talisman hanging about his neck, then added, 'Would you like a copy of it, Macumazahn, to keep as a memory? If so, I will carve one for you.'

'No,' I answered, 'I should not. Has Umslopogaas been

'Yes, he has been and gone again, which is one of the reasons why I do not wish to hear your tale a second time.'

'Where to? The Town of the People of the Axe?'

'No, Macumazahn, he came thence, or so I understood, but thither he will return no more.'

'Why not, Zikali?'

'Because after his fashion he made trouble there and left some dead behind him; one Lousta I believe, whom he had appointed to sit on his stool as chief while he was away, and a woman called Monazi, who was his wife, or Lousta's wife, or the wife of both of them, I forget which. It is said that having heard stories of her—and the ears of jealousy are long, Macumazahn—he cut off this woman's head with a sweep of the axe and made Lousta fight him till he fell, which the fool did almost before he had lifted his shield. It served him right who should have made sure that Umslopogaas was dead before he wrapped himself in his blanket and took the woman to cook his porridge.'

'Where has the Axe-bearer gone?' I asked without surprise, for this news did not astonish me.

'I neither know nor care, Macumazahn. To become a wanderer, I suppose. He will tell you the tale when you meet again in the after-days, as I understand he thinks that you will do.1 Hearken! I have done with this lion's whelp, who is Chaka over again, but without Chaka's wit. Yes, he is just a fighting man with a long reach, a sure eye and the trick of handling an axe, and such are of little use to me who know too many of them. Thrice have I tried to make him till my garden, but each time he has broken the hoe, although the wage I promised him was a royal kaross and nothing less. So enough of Umslopogaas, the Woodpecker. Almost I wish that you had not lent him the charm, for then the King's men would have made an end of him, who knows too much and like some silly boaster, may shout out the truth when his axe is aloft and he is full of the beer of battle. For in battle he will 'live and in battle he will die. Macumazahn, as perhaps you may see one day.'

'The fate of your friends does not trouble you over much,

Opener-of-Roads, I said with sarcasm.

Not at all, Macumazahn, because I have none. The only friends of the old are those whom they can turn to their ownends, and if these fail them they find others.
